

UNIVERSAL LIBRARY

125 698

UNIVERSAL
LIBRARY

ENGLISH
HISTORICAL LITERATURE
IN THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY

ENGLISH
HISTORICAL LITERATURE
IN THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY

BY CHARLES LETHBRIDGE KINGSFORD, M.A.

WITH AN
APPENDIX OF CHRONICLES AND HISTORICAL PIECES HITHERTO FOR THE MOST PART UNPRINTED

BURT FRANKLIN BIBLIOGRAPHICAL AND REFERENCE SERIES No. 37

BURT FRANKLIN
New York 25, N. Y.

Published by
BURT FRANKLIN
514 West 113th Street
New York 25, N. Y.

ORIGINALLY PUBLISHED IN OXFORD
AT THE CLARENDON PRESS
1913

Manufactured in the United States of America
by SENTRY PRESS, New York 19, N. Y.

PREFACE

THE purpose and scope of this volume (which is founded on a course of lectures delivered at Oxford in 1910) are explained sufficiently in the introductory chapter. I have added an appendix of short chronicles and historical pieces, which, with some partial exceptions, have not hitherto been printed. Their primary object is to illustrate the text; thus the interest of some of them is mainly textual or literary; but others, as notably the Northern Chronicle and the Sherborne Annals, have an intrinsic value of their own. They are all too short to have obtained independent publication; their usefulness will, I hope, be increased by their collection in the same place.

I have to thank Mr. E. H. Dring for directing my attention to The Great Chronicle of London, and for the courtesy with which he allowed me to make such free use of the manuscript; Dr. William Hunt for his kindness in reading part of my manuscript and for some useful criticism; Mr. W. A. Lindsay, K.C., Windsor Herald, for the opportunity to consult manuscripts at the College of Arms; Mr. D. T. Baird Wood and his colleagues in the Students' Room at the British Museum for assistance always readily given; and Mr. R. L. Poole and Messrs. Longmans, Green & Co. for permission to make use of two articles on 'The Early Biographies of Henry V' and 'The First Version of Hardyng's Chronicle', which I contributed to the English Historical Review.

C. L. K.

January 23, 1913.

CONTENTS

	PAGE
BIBLIOGRAPHY :
I. PRINTED EDITIONS OF ORIGINAL AUTHORITIES	viii
II. LIST OF MANUSCRIPTS DESCRIBED OR NOTICED IN THIS VOLUME	xii

CHAPTER I

INTRODUCTORY

Political characteristics of the fifteenth century. Their reflection in historical material. The literary development; beginnings of the Literary Renaissance; educational and intellectual ferment. The changes in historical literature. Scope of the proposed inquiry. Summary of the lines on which it proceeds. pp. 1-11

CHAPTER II

THOMAS WALSINGHAM AND HIS CONTEMPORARIES

1399-1423

Walsingham: his Historia Anglicana; the Ypodigma Neustriæ. The Annales Henrici Quarti. Thomas Otterbourne. The Vita Ricardi by the Monk of Evesham. Giles's Chronicle of Henry IV. The Continuation of the Eulogium Historiarum. A Southern Chronicle. Adam Usk. A Northern Chronicle. Continuations of Higden. Minor monastic annals. Clement Maidstone. John Capgrave. John Strecche. General characteristics. pp. 12-44

CHAPTER III

THE BIOGRAPHIES OF HENRY V

Thomas Elmham: the Gesta Henrici Quinti; the Liber Metricus; minor works. Tito Livio: his Vita. The Pseudo-Elmham: his Vita et Gesta; the Latin abridgement; the English version. The 'Translator of Livius' and the Earl of Ormonde. John Basset. Robert Redmayne. Illustration of literary development. pp. 45-69

CHAPTER IV

THE CHRONICLES OF LONDON

General characteristics; system of chronology; their development; their classification. Versions of 1430-2. Version of 1440. Version of 1445. Short version of 1446. The Continuations of S. Miscellaneous:

CONTENTS

v

Robert Bale's Chronicle; Gregory's Chronicle; Short Chronicle, 1461-83. The Main City Chronicle, 1440-85. Robert Fabyan. The Greyfriars' Chronicle. Richard Arnold's Customs of London. John Stow's Summary. Sources and historical value of the London Chronicles. Use made of them by other writers. Minor Town Chronicles. pp. 70-112

CHAPTER V

THE BRUT

Its importance; its early history; its historical interest; the main version ending in 1419; John Page's Siege of Rouen; the Continuation of 1430; the Continuation of 1461, or Caxton's Chronicles; the versions of Harley 53, and Lambeth 84; Davies's Chronicle; the Latin Brut; evidence for versions earlier than 1419; relation to Chronicles of London; sources; literary importance; use of by Waurin; and by Caxton.

pp. 113-39

CHAPTER VI

MINOR CHRONICLES OF THE MIDDLE OF THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY

1422-1469

Their fragmentary character. John Hardyng: his Chronicle; its sources and value. Lives of Henry VI by Capgrave and Blakman. The anonymous St. Albans Annals. John Whethamstede's Register. Giles's Chronicle of Henry VI. Continuations of the Latin Brut: Chronicle for 1445-55; Sherborne Annals; a Brief Latin Chronicle to 1471. Minor monastic chronicles: Waltham Annals; Ely Brief Notes; Gloucester Annals. William Worcester: his Annales; his Collections. Genealogical and Heraldic Rolls; the 'Considerans Chronicle'. Collections of a Yorkist Partisan. John Piggot's Memoranda. Gascoigne's Theological Dictionary. Politico-legal controversy: the Somnium Vigilantis; Sir John Fortescue's writings. Minor English works. Decay of Latin.

pp. 140-70

CHAPTER VII

CHRONICLES OF THE HOUSE OF YORK

1470-1485

Increased prevalence of English. Warkworth. Chronicle of the Rebellion in Lincolnshire. Manner and Guiding of the Earl of Warwick. Arrival of Edward IV; French versions. Hearne's Fragment. Yorkist Notes, 1471. Records of state ceremonies. Continuations of the Croyland Chronicle. John Rous. History of King Richard III. Polydore Vergil.

pp. 171-92

CHAPTER VIII

CORRESPONDENCE: PRIVATE AND OFFICIAL

Importance as a source for fifteenth-century history. State of education at the time and increasing use of English. Collections of private correspondence: the Paston Letters; their history; the history of the family; the Pastons and Fastolf; illustration of political history; illustration of social life. The Stonor Letters. The Plumpton Correspondence. The Cely Papers. The Trevelyan Papers. The Letters of John Shillingford. General collections: Ellis's Original Letters; official correspondence in Cotton. MSS.; Halliwell-Phillipps's Letters of the Kings of England; Champollion-Figeac's Lettres de Rois, &c.; Delpit's Collection; Ancient Correspondence at the Record Office; London Letters in the Guildhall Archives; Letter-books of Christ Church, Canterbury; Epistolae Academicæ. Collections of a more limited range: Hingeston's Royal and Historical Letters, Henry IV; Le Cotton. MS. Galba B i; Aus der Kanzlei Sigmunds; Stevenson, Letters and Papers, &c., Henry VI; Official Correspondence of T. Bekynton; Letters of Margaret of Anjou; Memorials of St. Edmund's Abbey; Letter-book of William Swan; Gairdner's Letters, &c., Richard III; Davies's York Records. Royal Historical MSS. Commission. Isolated letters. pp. 193-227

CHAPTER IX

POETRY AND BALLADS

Latin Poetry. 'English poets: Hoccleve; Lydgate; George Ashby. Political poems from Digby MS. 102. Politico-religious poems. The Libel of English Policy. 'Prophecies.' Ballads: the Battaile of Agincourt; other Agincourt ballads; ballads on the defence of Calais. Some minor poems. Satirical verses against Suffolk. Ballads of the Wars of the Roses. Ballads on the downfall of Richard III. William Peiris. pp. 228-52

CHAPTER X

SIXTEENTH-CENTURY HISTORIANS AND FIFTEENTH-CENTURY HISTORY

Reasons for their inclusion. Polydore Vergil: his sources and prejudice; his advance in historical method. Use of English by the 'Translator of Livius'. The change of method and form a result of past development. Influence of London as the centre of national life. Edward Hall: his sources; his prejudices; his influence on his successors. Richard Grafton. Lanquet and Cooper. John Stow: width of his research; his Summary of English Chronicles; his Annales; his sources; his merits as an historian. Raphael Holinshed: character of his Chronicles; his sources; adopts Hall's prejudices; his influence on Shakespeare, and consequently on popular opinion. pp. 253-74

APPENDIX

	PAGES
I. A Southern Chronicle, 1399-1422	275
II. A Northern Chronicle, 1399-1430	279
III. Extracts from London Chronicles :
(1) London Chronicle for 1413-18	292
(2) London Chronicle for 1421-30	295
(3) London Chronicle for 1446-52	296
IV. The Brut, 1413-17	299
V. The Latin Brut	310
(1) The Common Version for 1399 to 1437	312
(2) The Longer Version for the reign of Henry V	323
VI. Brief Notes for 1440-43	338
VII. A Chronicle for 1445 to 1455	342
VIII. Sherborne Annals, 1437-56	346
IX. Waltham Annals, 1422-47	350
X. Gloucester Annals, 1449-69	355
XI. Collections of a Yorkist Partizan, 1447-52	358
XII. John Piggot's Memoranda, 1450-54	369
XIII. Yorkist Notes, 1471	374
XIV. From a Chronicle of Tewkesbury Abbey, 1471	376
XV. The Record of Bluemantle Pursuivant, 1471-2	379
XVI. Calendar of Fifteenth-Century Letters contained in the Reports of the Royal Commission on Historical Manu- scripts	389
XVII. On the Mutability of Worldly Changes	395
INDEX	398

BIBLIOGRAPHY

I. PRINTED EDITIONS OF ORIGINAL AUTHORITIES¹

- Aginccourt, Bataille of*, ap. Elmham Vita Henrici Quinti, ed. Hearne, pp. 359-75; and Nicolas, Chronicle of London, pp. 216-33.
- AMUNDESHAM, JOHN. Annales, ed. H. T. Riley, Rolls Series, 1870. (Includes the anonymous St. Albans Annals.)
- Annales Henrici Quarti*, ap. Trokelowe, Blaneford, &c., ed. H. T. Riley, Rolls Series, 1866.
- ANSTEY, H. Epistolae Academicæ. Oxf. Hist. Soc., 1898.
- Archæologia*, vols. xxix, xxxiii. Political Poems.
- ARNOLD, RICHARD. Customs of London, ed. Ellis, 1811.
- Arrival of King Edward IV, The*, ed. J. Bruce, Camden Soc., 1st Series, 1838.
- ASHBY, GEORGE. Poems, ed. Mary Bateson. Early English Text Society, 1899.
- BEKYNTON, THOMAS. Official Correspondence, ed. G. Williams, Rolls Series, 1872.
- Bermondsey Annals*, ap. Annales Monastici, iii, ed. H. R. Luard, Rolls Series, 1866.
- BLAKMAN, JOHN. Vita Henrici Sexti, ap. Duo Rerum Anglicarum Scriptores, ed. Hearne, 1732.
- Brut, The, or the Chronicles of England*, ed. F. W. D. Brie. Early English Text Society, 1906-8. See also Caxton, Chronicles of England, and Davies's Chronicle.
- Cantuarienses, Litteræ*. Letter-books of the Monastery of Christ Church, Canterbury, ed. J. B. Sheppard, Rolls Series, 1887-9.
- CAPGRAVE, JOHN. The Chronicle of England, ed. F. C. Hingeston, Rolls Series, 1858.
- Liber de Illustribus Henricis, ed. F. C. Hingeston, Rolls Series, 1858.
- CARO, J. B. Aus der Kanzlei Sigmunds. Vienna, 1879.
- CAXTON, WILLIAM. Chronicles of England, 1480. See Brut.
- Polychronicon, 1482. Also ap. Higden, Polychronicon, vol. viii, ed. J. R. Lumby, Rolls Series, 1882.
- Cely Papers, The: a Correspondence between Merchants of the Staple in London and Calais, 1477-87*, ed. H. E. Malden. Camden Third Series, 1900.
- CHAMPOLLION-FIGEAC, A. Lettres de Rois, Reines, &c., de France et d'Angleterre (Documents inédits). Paris, 1839-47.
- Christ Church Letters relating to the Priory of Christ Church, Canterbury*, ed. J. B. Sheppard. Camden Soc., 2nd Series, 1877.
- COLE, C. A. Memorials of Henry V (1. Robert Redmayne, Historia

¹ This list does not include the pieces printed in the Appendix to this volume.

- Henrici Quinti*; 2. Versus Rythmici; 3. Elmham, Liber Metricus). Rolls Series, 1858.
- Collections of a London Citizen* (John Page, Siege of Rouen; Gregory's Chronicle), ed. J. Gairdner. Camden Soc., 2nd Series, 1876.
- Croyland Chronicle, Continuation of*, ap. Gale's Scriptores, 1684.
- DAVIES, J. S. English Chronicle, 1377-1461. Camden Soc., 1st Series, 1856.
- DAVIES, R. Extracts from the Municipal Records of the City of York, 1843.
- DELPIIT, J. Documents français en Angleterre (Documents inédits). Paris, 1847.
- DRING, E. H. The Great Chronicle of London, 1913.
- ELLIS, SIR H. Original Letters Illustrative of English History (Three Series), 1825-40.
- ELMHAM, THOMAS.¹ Gesta Henrici Quinti, ed. B. Williams. Engl. Hist. Soc., 1850.
- Liber Metricus. See COLE, C. A.
- Eulogium Historiarum, Continuation of*, ed. F. R. Haydon, Rolls Series, 1863.
- Evesham, Chronicle of*, ed. W. D. Macray. Rolls Series, 1863.
- EVESHAM, MONK OF. Vita Ricardi Secundi, ed. T. Hearne, 1729.
- Excerpta Historica*, ed. S. Bentley, 1831.
- FABYAN, ROBERT. The New Chronicles of England and of France, ed. Ellis, 1811.
- FLENLEY, R. Six Town Chronicles, 1911.
- FORTESCUE, SIR JOHN. Works, ed. Lord Clermont, 1869.
- Governance of England, ed. C. Plummer, 1885.
- Somnium Vigilantis, ap. Engl. Hist. Rev., xxvi. 512-25, 1911.
- GAIRDNER, J. Letters and Papers illustrative of the Reigns of Richard III and Henry VII. Rolls Series, 1861-3.
- See also Collections of a London Citizen, Paston Letters, and Three Fifteenth-Century Chronicles.
- GASCOIGNE, THOMAS. Loci e Libro Veritatum, ed. J. E. T. Rogers, 1881.
- Gesta Henrici Quinti*. See ELMHAM.
- GILES, J. A. Incerti Scriptoris Chronicon de regnis . . . Henrici IV, Henrici V, et Henrici VI, 1848.
- La Révolte du Conte de Warwick. Caxton Soc., 1839.
- GILLIODTS VAN SEVEREN, L. Le Cotton. MS. Galba B i (Chroniques Belges inédites). Brussels, 1896.
- GOWER, JOHN. Chronica Tripertita, ap. Works, iv. 314-43, ed. G. C. Macaulay, 1899-1901.
- GRAFTON, RICHARD. History of the reigns of Edward IV, Edward V, and Richard III. Printed with the Chronicle of John Hardyng; ed. Ellis, 1812.
- Gregory's Chronicle*. See Collections of a London Citizen.
- Greyfriars' Chronicle of London*, ap. Monumenta Franciscana, ii. 143-262, ed. R. Howlett, Rolls Series, 1882.
- HALL, EDWARD. Chronicle, ed. Ellis, 1809.

¹ See also PSEUDO-ELMHAM.

- HALLIWELL-PHILLIPPS, J. O. Letters of the Kings of England, 1846.
- HARDYNG, JOHN. Chronicle, ed. Ellis, 1812.
- Extracts from the first version of his Chronicle, ap. Engl. Hist. Rev. xxvii. 740-53, 1912.
- HEARNE, THOMAS. A Remarkable Fragment of an Old English Chronicle, ap. Thomas Sprott, Chronicle, pp. 283-306, 1719.
- HIGDEN, RANULPH. Polychronicon, vol. viii (giving Caxton's Continuation), ed. J. R. Lumby, Rolls Series, 1882.
- HINGESTON, F. C. Royal and Historical Letters, Henry IV. Rolls Series, 1860.
- Historical Manuscripts, Royal Commission on, Reports.* (See pp. 389-94, below.)
- HOCCEVE, THOMAS. Works, ed. F. J. Furnivall. Early English Text Society, 1892-7.
- HOLINSHED, RAPHAEL. Chronicles, ed. Ellis, 1807-8.
- KAIL, J. Twenty-six Political and other Poems. Early English Text Society, 1904.
- Lincolnshire, Chronicle of the Rebellion in*, ed. J. G. Nichols, ap. Camden Miscellany, vol. i. Camden Soc., 1847.
- LIVIO DA FORLÌ, TITO. Vita Henrici Quinti, ed. T. Hearne, 1716.
- See also TRANSLATOR OF LIVIUS.
- London, Chronicles of* (Julius B ii, Cleopatra C iv, and Vitellius A xvi), ed. C. L. Kingsford, 1905.
- See also ARNOLD, R., Brut, Collections of a London Citizen, DRING, E. H. (The Great Chronicle), FABYAN, R., FLENLEY, R., Greyfriars' Chronicle, NICOLAS, SIR N. H., Three Fifteenth-Century Chronicles.
- Louth Park Abbey, Chronicle of.* Lincolnshire Record Society, 1891.
- LYDGATE, JOHN. Minor Poems, ed. H. MacCracken. Early English Text Society, 1911.
- Verses on the Reception of Henry VI in London in February 1432, ap. Chronicles of London, pp. 97-116.
- Battaile of Agincourt and London Lichpenny, ap. Nicolas, Chronicle of London. See also Wright, Political Poems.
- MAIDSTONE, CLEMENT. Historia Martyrii Ricardi Scrope, ap. Wharton, Anglia Sacra, ii. 169-72, 1691.
- Margaret of Anjou, Letters of*, ed. C. Monro. Camden Soc., 1st Series, 1863.
- Meaux Abbey, Chronicon de Melsa*, ed. E. A. Bond, Rolls Series, 1866-8.
- MORE, SIR THOMAS, History of Richard III, ed. J. R. Lumby, 1883.
- NICHOLS, J. G. Grants of Edward V. Camden Soc., 1st Series, 1854.
- NICOLAS, SIR N. H. Proceedings and Ordinances of the Privy Council. Record Commission, 1834-7.
- and E. TYRRELL. Chronicle of London (Harley 565, and Julius B i), 1827.
- OTTERBOURNE, THOMAS. Chronicle, ed. T. Hearne, ap. Duo rerum Anglicarum Scriptores, 1732.
- PAGE, JOHN. Siege of Rouen. See Brut and Collections of a London Citizen. Paston Letters, The, ed. J. Gairdner, 6 vols., 1904.

- PERCY, T. Bishop Percy's Folio MS., ed. J. W. Hales and F. J. Furnivall, 1867-8.
- Plumpton Correspondence*, ed. T. Stapleton. Camden Soc., 1st Series, 1839.
- Political Poems*. See Archæologia, KAIL, J., and WRIGHT, T.
- PSEUDO-ELMHAM. Thomæ Elmham, Vita et Gesta Henrici Quinti, ed. T. Hearne, 1727.
- Latin abbreviation, ap. Gesta Henrici Quinti. Engl. Hist. Soc., 1850.
- RICART, ROBERT. The Maire of Bristowe is Kalendar, ed. L. Toulmin Smith. Camden Soc., 2nd Series, 1872.
- Richard III, Letters and Papers*. See GAIRDNER, J.
- RILEY, H. T. Memorials of London Life, 1868.
- ROUS, JOHN. Historia Regum Angliæ, ed. T. Hearne, 1729.
- St. Albans Annals*, ap. Amundesham Annales, vol. i, Rolls Series, 1870.
- St. Edmund's Abbey, Memorials of (Bury Chronicle, ad. 1471, and Letters)*, ed. T. Arnold, Rolls Series, 1890-6.
- SEYER, S. Memorials of Bristol (with extracts from Bristol Chronicles), 1821.
- SHARPE, R. R. London and the Kingdom (with Letters from the City Archives in vol. iii. 359-92), 1895.
- Calendars of Letter-books, I and K, 1909-11.
- SHEPPARD, J. B. See Cantuarienses and Christ Church Letters.
- SHILLINGFORD, JOHN. Letters and Papers, 1447-50, ed. S. A. Moore. Camden Soc., 2nd Series, 1871.
- STEVENSON, J. Letters and Papers Illustrative of the Wars of the English in France, Rolls Series, 1861-4.
- STOW, JOHN. Annales, or a General Chronicle of England, ed. E. Howes, 1631.
- Summary of English Chronicles, 1575.
- Survey of London, ed. C. L. Kingsford, 1908.
- Three Fifteenth-Century Chronicles (A Short English Chronicle = London Chronicle S.; Continuation of the Latin Brut to 1471; Ely Brief Notes)*, ed. J. Gairdner. Camden Soc., 2nd Series, 1880.
- TRANSLATOR OF LIVIUS. The First English Life of Henry V, ed. C. L. Kingsford, 1911.
- Trevelyan Papers*, vol. i, ed. J. P. Collier. Camden Soc., 1st Series, 1857.
- USK, ADAM. Chronicle, ed. Sir E. M. Thompson, 1904.
- VERGIL, POLYDORE. Anglica Historia, 1557.
- English Translation for 1422-85, ed. Sir H. Ellis. Camden Soc., 1844.
- WALSINGHAM, THOMAS. Historia Anglicana, ed. H. T. Riley, Rolls Series, 1863.
- Ypodigma Neustriæ, ed. H. T. Riley, Rolls Series, 1876.
- WARKWORTH, JOHN. Chronicle, ed. J. O. Halliwell. Camden Soc., 1st Series, 1839.
- WAURIN, JEAN. Chroniques, ed. Hardy, Rolls Series, 1868-91.
- WHARTON, HENRY. Anglia Sacra, 1691.
- WHETHAMSTEDE, JOHN. Registrum Abbatiae, ed. H. T. Riley, Rolls Series, 1872.
- White Rose, Chronicles of the*, 1845.

- WORCESTER, WILLIAM. Annales Rerum Anglicarum, and Collections, ap. Stevenson, Letters, &c., Rolls Series, 1864.
 ——— Itinerarium, ed. J. Nasmyth, 1778.
 WRIGHT, THOMAS. Political Poems and Songs, vol. ii, Rolls Series, 1861.

II. LIST OF MANUSCRIPTS DESCRIBED OR NOTICED IN THIS VOLUME

I. IN LONDON

(a) At the British Museum

ADDITIONAL MSS. :

- 4596-616. Transcripts for Rymer's Foedera. See p. 213.
 6113, ff. 101-7, The Record of Bluemantle Pursuivant. See pp. 178, 379-88.
 10104. Adam Usk's Chronicle. See p. 35.
 11269. Calendar of Harley 433. See p. 224 n.
 11714. A Southern Chronicle. See pp. 31, 275-8.
 34764. An English Chronicle to 1440. See p. 169.
 35295. John Strecche, Historia Regum Anglie. See pp. 39, 40.
 ARUNDEL MS. 28, f. 25, Yorkist Notes, 1471. See pp. 178, 374-5.
 COTTON. MSS. :
 Julius A v, ff. 177-9, 'Prophecy' of Merlin. See p. 236 n.
 Julius B i. London Chronicle. See pp. 75, 80, 81, 99.
 Julius B ii. London Chronicle. See pp. 76, 77, 80.
 Julius B iii. Latin Brut. See p. 311 n.
 Julius C vi, ff. 255-9, The Record of Bluemantle Pursuivant. See pp. 178, 379-88.
 Julius E iv, ff. 10-87, Pseudo-Elmham, Vita et Gesta Henrici Quinti; ff. 88-111, Thomas Elmham, Liber Metricus; ff. 113-27, Thomas Elmham, Gesta Henrici Quinti; Article 6, Life of Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick. See pp. 49, 56, 185.
 Tiberius A viii. Capgrave, De Illustribus Henricis. See p. 39.
 Tiberius C ix. Vita Ricardi Secundi, by a Monk of Evesham. See p. 24.
 Claudius A viii. Brut. See p. 120 n.
 Claudius B ix. Vita Ricardi Secundi, by a Monk of Evesham. See p. 24.
 Claudius E iii. Tito Livio, Vita Henrici Quinti. See pp. 51, 55.
 Claudius E iv. Thomas Elmham, Cronica Regum. See p. 50.
 Nero C xi. Fabyan, Chronicle. See pp. 103, 104.
 Galba B i. Papers relating to Flanders. See pp. 214, 220.
 Galba E vii. Eulogium Historiarum. See p. 28.
 Galba E viii. Brut. See pp. 299-309.
 Galba E ix, ff. 49, 50, 'Prophecy' of Merlin; ff. 113-14, Ballad on the Siege of Calais. See pp. 236 n., 241.
 Otho B xiii. Formerly contained the Croyland Chronicle. See p. 179 n.
 Vitellius A xvi. London Chronicle. See pp. 81, 91, 99.
 Vitellius D xii. Formerly contained the Battaile of Agincourt. See p. 238.

- Vitellius F ix, ff. 1-70, London Chronicle; ff. 147-239, Otterbourne Chronicle. See pp. 23, 80, 84.
- Vespasian B xvi, ff. 1-4. Jack Napes. See p. 244 n.
- Vespasian C xii. Papers relating to Spain. See p. 214.
- Vespasian E viii. Latin Prophecies. See p. 236 n.
- Vespasian F iii. State Papers and Letters. See p. 213.
- Vespasian F vii. Papers of the Privy Council. See p. 214.
- Vespasian F xiii. State Papers and Letters. See p. 213.
- Titus D xv. Waltham Annals. See pp. 160, 350-4.
- Domitian A iv, ff. 53-7, Latin Brut; ff. 246-56, Gloucester Annals. See pp. 310-12, 355-7.
- Domitian A xii. Northern Chronicle. See pp. 279-91.
- Cleopatra C iv, ff. 22-61, London Chronicle; ff. 124-204, Letter-book of William Swan. See pp. 77, 80, 88, 89, 224.
- Cleopatra E ii and E iii. Papers on ecclesiastical affairs. See p. 213.
- Cleopatra F iii and F iv. Papers of the Privy Council. See p. 214.
- Faustina B ix, ff. 241-2, 'Prophecy'. See p. 236 n.
- Cotton. Roll, ii. 23. Collections of a Yorkist Partizan. See pp. 165, 236, 242-4, 358-68.

EGERTON MSS.:

650. Brut; London Chronicle. See pp. 85 n., 86.
1992. Hardyng, Chronicle. See p. 149 n.
- 1995, ff. 87-109, John Page, Siege of Rouen; ff. 113-222, Gregory's Chronicle. See pp. 81, 91, 96, 117.
2885. Latin Chronicle of London to 1382. See p. 71 n.

HARLEY MSS.:

35. 'Translator of Livius.' See p. 64.
53. Brut. See pp. 30, 122-5.
266. Brut. See p. 302.
- 283, f. 2, Confession of Sir R. Welles. See p. 174.
- 367, ff. 89-100, Song of the Lady Bessy. See p. 252.
433. Register of Grants under Privy Seal, temp. Richard III. See p. 224.
- 530, ff. 19-30, English abridgement of Pseudo-Elmham. See p. 64.
- 540, ff. 7-21, London Chronicle, 1527-55; ff. 40-5, London Chronicle, 1421-47. See pp. 81, 92, 93, 108, 295-6.
- 541, ff. 215-19, London Chronicle. See p. 106 n.
- 543, ff. 31-49, Arrival of Edward IV; f. 144, John Piggot's Memoranda. With other Collections of John Stow. See pp. 166, 174, 369-73.
- 545, f. 132, A Chronicle of Tewkesbury Abbey. With other Collections of John Stow. See pp. 178, 370, 376-8.
565. London Chronicle; Battle of Agincourt. See pp. 80, 83, 84, 135 n., 238.
661. Hardyng, Chronicle. See p. 149 n.
- 746, ff. 1-3, 'Prophecy' of Merlin. See p. 236 n.
753. Brut. See pp. 132, 302.
864. Pseudo-Elmham, Vita et Gesta Henrici Quinti. See pp. 56, 62 n.
2256. Brut. See p. 302.

3600. Northern Chronicle. See pp. 35, 279-91.
 3643. Otterbourne, Chronicle. See p. 23.
 3775, ff. 78-99, London Chronicle; ff. 100-20, St. Albans Annals. See pp. 76, 80, 83, 150 n., 292-5.
 3884, ff. 226-7, Latin Brut; ff. 228-9, Chronicle for 1445-55. See pp. 158, 310, 342-5.
 3906, ff. 101-7, Latin Brut; ff. 108-11, Sherborne Annals. See pp. 158, 310-12, 346-9.
 6216, f. 23, Extract from 'Translator of Livius'. See p. 64 n.
 6223, ff. 4-21, Stow's translation of Otterbourne. See p. 23 n.
 7353. Illuminated Roll, Edward IV. See p. 165.
 Rolls C 5, C 7. The Claim of Richard Duke of York. See p. 165 n.
 Roll C 8. London Chronicle. See pp. 81, 94, 95.
 Roll C 9. 'Considerans' Chronicle. See p. 164 n.
- LANSDOWNE MSS. :
204. Hardyng, Chronicle. See pp. 42 n., 149 n.
 212. Latin Brut. See pp. 310-12, 323-37.
 Roll 6. Genealogical Roll, with historical notes. See pp. 165, 183-84.
- ROYAL MSS. :
- 13 C i. Giles's Chronicle, and Brief Notes for 1440-3. See pp. 24, 62, 155, 338-41.
 13 E ix. Walsingham, Historia Anglicana. See pp. 13, 14.
 14 B viii. 'Considerans' Chronicle. See p. 164 n.
 17 D xv, ff. 302-10, Somnium Vigilantis; ff. 327-32, 'The Balet of the Kynge,' styled by Wright The Recovery of the Throne. See pp. 167, 248.
 18 D ii. W. Peeris, Chronicle of the Family of Percy. See p. 252 n.
- SLOANE 1776. Giles's Chronicle; Elmham, Gesta Henrici Quinti. See pp. 24, 63, 155, 338.
 STOWE 73. 'Considerans' Chronicle. See p. 164 n.

(b) At the Record Office

ANCIENT CORRESPONDENCE :

- xliii, xlv, li, lvii, lviii. Miscellaneous Letters. See pp. 215-16.
 xlvi. Stonor Letters. See pp. 208-10.
 liii. Cely Papers. See p. 210.

(c) At the College of Arms

ARUNDEL MSS. :

3. Whethamstede's Register. See p. 154.
 5. Latin Brut with Continuation to 1471. See pp. 159, 310-12, 314 n.
 7. Walsingham, Historia Anglicana. See pp. 13, 15.
 12. Tito Livio, Vita Henrici Quinti. See pp. 52, 56.
 15. Pseudo-Elmham, Vita et Gesta Henrici Quinti. See pp. 56, 59 n., 62.
 19. London Chronicle. See pp. 80, 90, 296-8.
 48. William Worcester's Collections. See pp. 69, 163.
 I. 9. Events in the North, 1471. See p. 173 n.
- VINCENT 435. Chronicle of the Rebellion in Lincolnshire. See p. 173.

(d) *At Lambeth Palace*LAMBETH 6. Brut. See p. 125.84. Brut. See pp. 125-6.99. Latin Brut. See p. 311.211. Correspondence of T. Bakyn-ton. See p. 221.306. London Chronicle ; Political Poems. See pp. 94, 244 n., 247 n.448. Ely Brief Notes. See p. 161 n.(e) *Society of Antiquaries*101. A Political Retrospect. See p. 248.

2. AT CAMBRIDGE

(a) *University Library*Gg. iv. 12. Capgrave, Chronicle of England. See p. 39.Hh. vi. 9. Brut ; London Chronicle. See pp. 85 n., 92 n.Mm. iv. 42. Poems by George Ashby. See p. 232 n.(b) College of Libraries

CORPUS CHRISTI COLLEGE :

7. Annales Henrici Quarti, and other St. Albans Chronicles. See pp. 13, 15, 19.112. Tito Livio, Vita Henrici Quinti. See p. 56.167. Capgrave, Chronicle of England. See p. 39.285. Tito Livio, Vita Henrici Quinti. See p. 55.367. Continuation of the Polychronicon. See p. 37.408. Capgrave, De Illustribus Henricis. See p. 39.

PETERHOUSE :

Warkworth, Chronicle. See p. 172.

TRINITY COLLEGE :

636. 'Considerans' Chronicle. See p. 164 n.1414 (O. 9. 1.) Brut ; London Chronicle. See p. 92 n.

3. AT OXFORD

(a) *In the Bodleian Library*ASHMOLE 34. Hardyng, Chronicle. See p. 149 n.

1160. Declaration by Clarence and Warwick in 1469. See p. 173 n.

BODLEY 124. John Page, Siege of Rouen. See p. 116 n.596. London Chronicle. See p. 87.

966. 'Translator of Livius.' See p. 64.

Auct. D 4, 5. Thomas Gascoigne's account of Archbishop Scrope. See p. 38.

DIGBY 102. Political and other Poems. See p. 233.DOUCE 345. Hardyng, Chronicle. See p. 149 n.GOUGH London 10. London Chronicle. See pp. 81, 103.

RAWLINSON MSS. :

B 147. Latin Brut. See p. 311.B 169. Latin Brut. See pp. 310-12.B 173. Brut ; London Chronicle. See p. 85 n.B 195. Latin Brut. See p. 310.B 355. London Chronicle. See pp. 81, 102, 112.

C 234. Godstow Chronicle. See p. 311.

C 398. Latin Brut. See pp. 310-23.

C 813. Poems. See pp. 237, 395-77.

SELDEN B 10. Hardyng, Chronicle. See p. 149 n.

TANNER 2. London Chronicle. See p. 106.

(b) College Libraries

ALL SOULS COLLEGE :

38. Pseudo-Elmham, Vita et Gesta Henrici Quinti. See pp. 56, 58.

40. 'Considerans' Chronicle. See p. 164 n.

BALLIOL COLLEGE :

354. Lamentation of the Duchess of Gloucester. See p. 242 n.

CORPUS CHRISTI COLLEGE :

208. Croyland Chronicle. See p. 179 n.

JESUS COLLEGE :

29. Chronicon Regum Angliae. See p. 160.

LINCOLN COLLEGE :

117, 118. T. Gascoigne, Theological Dictionary. See p. 167.

MAGDALEN COLLEGE :

200. Latin Brut. See p. 311.

QUEEN'S COLLEGE :

168. 'Considerans' Chronicle. See p. 164 n.

ST. JOHN'S COLLEGE :

23. 'Considerans' Chronicle. See p. 164 n.

57. London Chronicle. See pp. 76, 77, 86, 87.

58. 'Considerans' Chronicle. See p. 164 n.

78. Latin Brut. See pp. 310-12, 323-37.

209. Bury St. Edmund's Chronicle. See p. 160.

4. AT DUBLIN

TRINITY COLLEGE :

E 5. 9. Robert Bale, London Chronicle. See pp. 81, 95.

5. AT PARIS

BIBLIOTHÈQUE NATIONALE, Latin 6240. Pseudo-Elmham, Vita et Gesta Henrici Quinti. See p. 56 n.

6. IN PRIVATE COLLECTIONS

MARQUIS OF BATH at Longleat :

Continuation of the Polychronicon. See p. 37.

London Chronicle. See pp. 77, 80, 88.

ESHTON HALL. London Chronicle. See pp. 80, 84.

EARL OF LEICESTER at Holkham. Fabyan, Chronicle. See p. 103 n.

MR. QUARITCH :

'Fabian's MS.' (The Great Chronicle of London). See pp. 77, 80, 81, 83, 100, 101.

Brut. See p. 302.

LORD TOLLEMACHE at Helmingham. Hardyng, Chronicle. See p. 149 n.

YELVERTON 35. Documents relating to fifteenth-century history. See p. 270 n.

CHAPTER I

INTRODUCTORY

THE history of the fifteenth century in England leaves on a first acquaintance the impression that it is somewhat barren of interest and deficient in unity and concentration of purpose. It does not present the same richness of promise or achievement as we find in the thirteenth, nor even the chivalrous glamour of the fourteenth century. On the other hand it hardly seems to foreshadow the new enterprises and developments of the sixteenth. We are struck by the disastrous ending of the French war, by the confused tumult of civil strife, and by the consequent breakdown of the government and prevalence of social disorder. But underlying all this evil there was much that was strong and promising. The age that produced Henry V and John of Bedford, Richard of York and his sons, let alone the four Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, cannot have been wanting altogether in virility and high purpose. Its apparent lack of unity and concentration is to be explained by the fact that it was a time of transition. The old order both in Church and State was breaking down. Men could see the need for reformation, but did not realize how much ruin had to be cleared away so that a new road might lie open before them.

As regards the early part of the fifteenth century at all events it would be more just to charge it with precocity than with unfruitfulness. Henry V realized hardly less clearly than did his Tudor successors the great aims and broad principles which underlay both his policy and theirs. Like them he sought to make England self-reliant and in a sense self-sufficient. Like them he found the means to his end in the establishment of a firm central government; in the restoration of the Church to its position as a truly national institution; in the creation of a strong navy; in the development of social prosperity at home, and of commerce abroad. It was in the application rather than in the idea that he, or his immediate successors, failed; for that failure it was their environment and the trammels of worn-out principles and methods that were most to blame. So also of parliamentary government under the Lancastrian kings it has become an historical commonplace to say that constitutional progress had outrun administrative order.¹ Under Henry IV Parliament sometimes dictated to the King. If Henry V knew how to control his Parliaments he did not dictate to them. It was the lack of driving force in the Government which led to the breakdown of constitutionalism under Henry VI. The strength of the Yorkist kings, and still more of the Tudors, enabled them to bend Parliament to their will. But the forms of constitutional government were too strong to be altered, and the principles which the fifteenth century had established were to bear their fruit two hundred years later.

Thus the age was not uncreative. That the nation was at its heart politically sound is proved sufficiently by the fact that the very years when social disorder and administrative chaos were at their height witnessed the striking growth of municipal life and of a popular movement towards more effective self-government. After the worst of the trouble followed the strong rule of the House of York. Though much of the old evil still continued, we can now see more clearly that all the time those creative forces were at work which were to show forth their fruit in the next age.

It is important to realize the political and social characteristics of the fifteenth century, because they are reflected in the materials with which the historian has to deal. Here again we are at first sight confronted with barrenness of achievement and lack of concentration; here also appearances are in some degree deceptive. The age which produced the translations of 'Mandeville' and Malory's great romance cannot have been wanting wholly in the literary instinct. It is true that we have no History which deserves to be ranked as a literary production with those two works. It is true also that we have in England no contemporary authority who gives us a comprehensive survey of any considerable period.

¹ Stubbs, Constitutional History, iii. 276, 3rd ed.

For the most part we must piece together our story from a number of small sources, many of them of a more or less avowedly partisan character, which require to be used with discrimination and to be weighed carefully one against another. Nevertheless, closer study reveals that English historical literature in the fifteenth century is neither unfruitful nor lacking in interest.

The literary development is in some respects curiously parallel to the course of political events. At the beginning of the century we are still in the Middle Ages. History was still for the most part being written on mediaeval models by ecclesiastics. But the signs of decay and of the imminence of change are obvious. It is no mere chance that the victories of Henry V should coincide so closely with the first displacement of French or Latin by English as the recognized medium of official correspondence;¹ that at this time the English Chronicles of London should begin to take shape,² and the great English Chronicle of the Brut should be in process of compilation as a contemporary authority for popular reading.³ If in a sense more natural it is hardly less noteworthy that the battle of Agincourt in 1415 and the defence of Calais in 1436 should furnish the occasion for two of our oldest groups of historical ballad poetry. The twenty years which separate those two events were on the whole glorious for England. They assuredly witnessed a great awakening of vigorous national feeling, and not less assuredly did that feeling find expression in the historical literature of the day. The thirty years which followed were a time of political and social disorder, which has its reflection in the formless and fragmentary character of contemporary historical narratives. But if the period of disorder was not without more hopeful elements of political life, so also it is to be remarked that the most valuable of the Paston Letters date from this time, and that London citizens were then setting down their freshest and most spontaneous accounts of contemporary events. If neither the Letters nor the London Chronicles are literary productions of a high order, they were not artificial. It is not without a very real significance that they should both have sprung from the upper middle and commercial classes, which showed the best promise of political and social recovery.

¹ See pp. 196, 214, 218 below.

² See pp. 75-77 below.

³ See p. 133, below.

The middle of the fifteenth century in England was indeed far from devoid of literary and intellectual interests. The patronage which Henry V extended to Hoccleve and Lydgate was not merely formal; he was fond of reading not only works on hunting and goodly tales, but also Chronicles and even theology; for his own share of the spoils of Caen, the Earl of Ormonde relates that he chose a book of histories.¹ Whether the story that Henry had received part of his education at Oxford be true or not, he seems to have taken a genuine interest in the welfare of the University, and promised to enrich it with a donation of manuscripts.² It was, however, not Henry but his brother, Humphrey of Gloucester, who was pre-eminent as the first patron of the new learning in England.

Humphrey of Gloucester was himself a great collector of books, and his munificence to the University Library at Oxford has done more than aught else to preserve his good fame. The lists of his books show that his interests were more with classical antiquity and Italian literature than with mediaeval learning. He was, however, much more than a mere collector. Through his correspondence with Italian humanists like Leonardo Bruni and Pier Candido Decembri, he established a link between the revival of Letters on the Continent and in England. The assertion by the University of Oxford that under Gloucester's patronage Greek was coming to life,³ may be regarded either as flattery for the recipient or as conceit of the writer. Still, when this was written in 1441 the reproach of Poggio Bracciolini, who had visited this country some twenty years earlier, that English scholars delighted more in scholastic disputation than in the new learning,⁴ would have been hardly fair. For the historiographer Humphrey's patronage of Letters has a more practical bearing. It was on Humphrey's invitation that Tito Livio

¹ First English Life of Henry V, p. 92.

² Anstey, Epistolae Academicae, pp. 150-2.

⁴ Poggii Epistolae, p. 43, ed. Tonelli, 1832.

³ Id. p. 203.

da Forli came to England, and at Humphrey's suggestion that he compiled in his Vita Henrici Quinti a work which, though not of the first importance, was to have a distinctive influence in the development of English historical literature.¹

Duke Humphrey was not alone as a patron of letters and learning. The pseudo-Elmham was encouraged to write his Life of Henry V by Walter, Lord Hungerford.² James Butler, fourth Earl of Ormonde, had in his service scholars like James Yonge, who translated into English the Secreta Secretorum. Ormonde himself was a diligent student of history and antiquities, the rediscovery of whose Reminiscences is of importance alike for the history of the fifteenth century and for the study of its sources.³ Lydgate counted amongst his patrons the Earls of Warwick and Salisbury, whilst Hardyng benefited by the assistance of Cardinal Beaufort. The Duke of Suffolk, who was a friend of the poet-Prince Charles of Orleans, himself wrote poetry in French,⁴ whilst his duchess, who was a granddaughter of Chaucer, was a benefactress to the library at Oxford.⁵ If none of these did much to foster the new learning, they furnish evidence that even the highest nobility was not without its intellectual sympathies and tastes. Less important officials, like Adam Moleyns,⁶ Thomas Bekynton,⁷ and John Somerset,⁸ were themselves men of some learning, and were in friendly correspondence with scholars both in England and in Italy.

The interest in learning was not artificial, nor was it confined to the patronage of high persons. Education was in the air. The great foundations of Henry VI at Eton and Cambridge did not stand alone. Bequests for scholars and colleges at Oxford and Cambridge begin to appear in the

¹ See pp. 51, 53 below. ² See p. 58 below. ³ See p. 65 below.

⁴ See Dr. MacCracken, 'An English Friend of Charles of Orleans,' in Publications of the Modern Language Association of America, xxvi. 142-80, where it is suggested that Suffolk may have been the author of some of the English pieces included in the poems of Charles of Orleans.

⁵ Anstey, Epistolae Academicæ, p. 326. For a list of his books see Napier, Swyncombe and Ewelme, pp. 127-8.

⁶ Aeneas Sylvius (Epp. 80, 186; De Europa, p. 443) commended his literary style.

⁷ Correspondence of T. Bekynton, i. 160-61, 170-75, 264-75.

⁸ See pp. 57-59 below and Dict. Nat. Biog. liii. 245.

wills of rich London citizens.¹ The University of Oxford appeals with confidence for the assistance of wealthy merchants.² Schools were springing up in many places, as was natural enough at a time when men of all classes found need to be able to express themselves clearly in writing.³ The desire for instruction was not merely practical. Young Englishmen like William Grey, John Phreas or Free, and John Gunthorpe, all of them scholars of Balliol College, went to study in Italy under Guarini at Ferrara. William Sellyng, who is said to have been a Fellow of All Souls College and was afterwards prior of Christ Church, Canterbury, made more than one visit to Italy and was a zealous collector not only of Latin, but also of Greek manuscripts. William Grocyn and Thomas Linacre, who was Sellyng's pupil, came only a little later in date. Learning cannot have been altogether dead in the University which gave this succession of scholars their first training. In Thomas Bekynton, William Waynflete, John Morton, and John Russell we have another succession of men who were trained at Oxford for the service of the State; they all retained their interest in learning, and in after-life showed their gratitude to the University in a practical manner. Bekynton and Waynflete were mutual friends of Thomas Chaundler, who was Warden of New College from 1454 to 1475, whilst Russell was a Fellow and Grocyn a student there. Chaundler was a man of enlightened culture, at whose invitation Cornelio Vitelli came to lecture, perhaps as the first teacher of Greek, at Oxford. The notorious John Tiptoft, Earl of Worcester, did more than study law at Padua; he was a friend of John Phreas, and like him had studied under Guarini; his translation of Cicero's De Amicitia was printed by Caxton. Anthony Woodville is another instance of a nobleman of culture, and like Tiptoft was the translator into English of books which Caxton printed.

All this evidence of intellectual ferment relates to the most troubled period of the fifteenth century. It proves to the full that, however deficient in immediate results that age may have been, it was pregnant with promise as the seedtime of a more fruitful future.

¹ Cf. Sharpe, Calendar of Wills in Court of Husting, ii. 460, 510, 534.

² Anstey, Epistolæ Academicæ, pp. 29, 229, 275, 323.

³ On the educational development in the middle of the fifteenth century, see Leach, Educational Charters, pp. xxxvii-xli.

It is in this spirit that we must study both the history and the historical literature of England in the fifteenth century. For the historian there is a peculiar interest in tracing the decay of mediaevalism, and the beginnings and growth of the great ideas which were to make the next age so memorable. The student of literature, and perhaps still more the student of historical sources, is able to note the stages of a similar development. At the beginning of the fifteenth century contemporary historians and chroniclers preserve, if in decay, the characteristics of the past. For the most part they are monastic, writing from a narrow point of view, in Latin, and for a limited circle of readers. At its close we are on the threshold of a new epoch in historical literature. Our historians are beginning to put on a modern dress; they write, if with prejudice, yet from a broader and more national standpoint, they use most commonly the language of the people, and they appeal deliberately to a popular audience. The development was of course no sudden thing. It was going on throughout the whole century, and it was very far from complete at its close. The two causes which most obviously contributed to bring it about were the growth of national consciousness and the revival of learning. Neither by itself would have been sufficient. The first gave the living substance, and the second added the critical spirit and literary sense. The 'Translator of Livius' grasped the nature of the problem when he determined to write his history in rude and homely English, but realized how difficult a task it was to do so in a language from which all famous inditing was far exiled.¹ The measure of success which he achieved was due to the fact that he had thus unconsciously summarized the teaching of the past hundred years.

English literature had of course shown that it was recovering its national vigour before the fifteenth century opened. Chaucer was to have no immediate successor worthy of the name. But

¹ See pp. 67, 68, 259 below.

John de Trevisa by translating Higden's Polychronicon did no more than prepare the way for others to follow on more original lines. It was the early success of the French war which gave the stimulus that was needed to produce the firstfruit of a national historical literature. When this cause had for the moment spent its force there came the beginnings of the new learning. It is not insignificant that the best historical work of that time should have been written by the Italian, Tito Livio, and based in part on English originals. It was the first union of the two forces of national feeling and foreign culture. When the troubles cleared away English had gained the mastery as the right medium wherein to tell the story of England. If another Italian, Polydore Vergil, was to set our native historians a new model of historical method in Latin, his influence extended no further. His successors in the sixteenth century all wrote in English.¹

Viewed in this light English historical literature in the fifteenth century has a real unity. In no period of equal length can we trace a development of such great importance. For all practical purposes we are able to follow the movement from the start. I need make no excuse for closing my main inquiry with the downfall of the House of York. If there is something arbitrary about all chronological divisions of history, there are few dates for which more may be said than for 1485. In political history it marks fairly the close of the Middle Ages in England. Its near coincidence with the invention of printing and the first activity of the literary Renaissance makes it still more appropriate for the purpose of this volume. We have here a well-marked halt, and could find no better till a much later time. In all that is essential the age of transition was over, and we need only consider what followed so far as it may be necessary for the understanding of what had passed.

It is thus a principal purpose of this volume to trace during an important epoch the literary development of the writing of history in England. But whilst I shall endeavour always to keep this development in view, I do not intend to restrict at all the critical examination of the works to be discussed as sources for the historian. The need for such an examination must have impressed all who have had occasion to study the history of England in the fifteenth century. The defective character and doubtful quality of many of the contemporary Chronicles is not the least difficulty in the way of arriving at a sound judgement. If the problems of their interdependence and relative importance can be solved, a great obstacle will be removed. It was the study of Chronicles for this purpose which led incidentally to the recognition of their literary interest, and it is only through their critical examination that the course of literary development can be traced.

¹ Camden writing for scholars hardly forms an exception. Nicholas Harpsfield and other minor writers do not count.

The literary aspect has determined naturally the scope of this inquiry into the sources of our fifteenth-century history. I do not propose to treat at all of Records: their bibliography can be found in other quarters, and this is not the place in which to discuss their proper use and value. Municipal growth and ecclesiastical controversy are important elements in fifteenth-century history; but the consideration of such questions, and therefore also any discussion of the sources on which our knowledge of them depends, lies outside my province. Nor even after these are excluded do I propose to deal exhaustively with all the available sources for political history. In the fifteenth century the affairs of England and of France were so closely interwoven that the history of neither country can be studied properly without reference to the historians of the other. But to attempt any adequate criticism of French chroniclers as sources of English history would absorb too great a space, and would interrupt the unity of treatment at which I aim. It would, moreover, be vain, in view of the admirable work of M. Auguste Molinier on Les Sources de l'histoire de France, to give a brief summary here. Furthermore, though French sources are indispensable to the modern historian, they have little bearing on our own contemporary authorities. To the rare occasions on which the two touch I shall make reference from time to time. When in the last chapter I come to discuss the value of the history given by the historians of the sixteenth century, I shall allude briefly to their use of French originals as contributing to the formation of English opinion.

Having thus explained the general aims of this inquiry it will be useful to summarize here the particular lines on which it proceeds. It will begin with Thomas Walsingham and his Contemporaries, who wrote during the first quarter of the century, and represent with little variation the methods of the past. The Biographies of Henry V will not only furnish a homogeneous subject, but also, through the fact that their composition was spread over the whole period, enable us to trace through a connected series successive stages in the literary development of historical method. In the London Chronicles and the Brut we shall have presented the growth of history in English from a beginning, which if rude was popular and spontaneous, to a work which was not unworthy of its place as the first of our printed histories. The Minor Chronicles of the Middle Period will illustrate how completely old methods had failed before new ones were ready to take their place. The contemporary Chronicles for the latest years of the House of York do not possess any uniform characteristic; but they are instructive, on the one hand as showing the established position of English as the medium for popular history, and on the other hand as giving us in the Croyland Chronicle a Latin history remarkable for its breadth and critical power. The end is told in More's History of Richard III, which is the first historical work of outstanding literary merit in the English language, and in Polydore Vergil's Anglica Historia, which marked a new departure in historical method.

The general poverty of contemporary Chronicles in the fifteenth century has given the correspondence of private and official persons a place of exceptional importance amongst our historical sources. For that reason it would not be possible to pass over such material. If, moreover, even the Paston Letters do not in the strictest sense belong to literature, their unstudied and spontaneous character affords the best of evidence for the genuine quality of the intellectual movement which made them possible. The Paston Letters have been too often quoted as if they were a unique phenomenon instead of a happy survival. There is much other material of a similar character which must be brought into account. It would not be possible to discriminate exactly between the correspondence of private persons and officials. Therefore I have not hesitated to make my survey as wide as possible without extending it to include documents of a purely administrative character. The historical material of this class is so scattered that even a moderately comprehensive review will I hope be of service.

Ballads and poems form so essential a feature of English historical literature in the fifteenth century that their inclusion here needs no excuse. It has, however, seemed to be of more importance to fix their setting and value as sources for history than to consider their literary quality.

It may seem strange to conclude an account of English historical literature in the fifteenth century by a review of sixteenth-century historians. But it is requisite both to the history of the literary development and to the study of sources. It was only in the more finished product of the next age that the painful efforts of the fifteenth century showed fruit. I have endeavoured throughout to keep in view the relationship of the works of Hall, Stow, and Holinshed to their originals. But such isolated references would be inconclusive without a more detailed summary. The works of all three are still in some degree of value. Until of late they were the only medium through which many earlier writers were accessible. Their presentment of their material has done much to colour subsequent opinion. Recognition of their prejudices has sometimes carried reaction too far. It is therefore needful to mark clearly their sources and the use which they made of them. It was, moreover, on their narratives that Shakespeare founded his historical plays. The dramatist was perhaps even more than they were responsible for the framing of popular opinion. To trace his material to its ultimate original is therefore a proper conclusion to the study of English historical literature in the fifteenth century.

CHAPTER II

THOMAS WALSINGHAM AND HIS CONTEMPORARIES

1399 TO 1422

It is not unfitting that we should have to begin with a typical mediaeval historian whose work stands in the strongest possible contrast to the writings of those whom we shall have under consideration at the close. Thomas Walsingham was the last representative of the St. Albans school of historians who wrote on a large scale and travelled in his narrative beyond the walls of his monastery. Though we are indebted to him for the most complete consecutive account of the whole of the reigns of Henry IV and Henry V, he composed this part of his history at the close of a long life, and he belonged in spirit to the previous generation. It was probably in the latter part of the reign of Edward III that Walsingham became a monk at St. Albans. There he served as Precentor, and as Scriptorarius, or head of the copying-room, under Abbot Thomas de la Mare, who died in 1396. Two years earlier he had been appointed Prior of Wymondham, a post which he held till 1400, when he returned to St. Albans. He seems to have died about the beginning of the reign of Henry VI.

Walsingham's uneventful life gave him no special experience, but subject to such a limitation he had the advantage of a long training as a professional annalist. He was probably engaged on historical work soon after 1380; for in a passage written before 1388 the reader is referred for further information on Wat Tyler's rebellion to the 'Chronica Majora Fratris Thomae de Walsingham'.¹ This reference is further of importance as illustrating the writer's practice of compiling a detailed Chronicle and afterwards reducing it to a briefer version, whether with or without the occasional insertion of fresh material. Besides the Chronica Majora, which is now lost, Walsingham was the author or compiler of several other historical works, out of which we are here concerned only with the Historia Anglicana, called also by some sixteenth-century writers Historia Brevis, and the Ypodigma Neustriæ, both edited by H. T. Riley in the Rolls Series.

¹ Chronicon Angliae, 1328-88, Preface, p. xxxii. This is an early work of Walsingham's.

The Historia Anglicana extends from 1272 to 1422. The earlier part is of course compiled from older writers, and does not concern us. Riley further argued that in the later portion only the narrative for the fifteen years from 1377 to 1392 can be attributed to Walsingham himself. Down to the latter date the Historia is derived immediately from an older compilation of Walsingham's, which is contained in a volume once belonging to the Abbey of St. Albans and now forming part of Royal MS. 13 E ix at the British Museum. The source of the later portion, from 1392 to 1422, is found in MS. no. 7 at Corpus Christi College, Cambridge. This volume, which is also of St. Albans' composition, contains three Chronicles: (1) for 1392 to 1405; (2) for 1392 to 1406, of which as the Annales Henrici Quarti we shall have more to say; and (3) for 1392 to 1422. The second, as far as it extends, was the original of the other two, but does not seem to have been used directly by the compiler of the Historia Anglicana, which is preserved in its completed form in Arundel MS. 7 at the College of Arms, and is based mainly on the third Chronicle of the Cambridge manuscript, but with some additions from the first.¹

On this evidence Riley arrived at the conclusion that the latter part of the Historia Anglicana was not Walsingham's work. He admits that either or both of the first and third Cambridge Chronicles might have been compiled by Walsingham himself, but thinks it improbable. This opinion he bases on the style, diction, and treatment of the subject, the abrupt manner in which matters of high interest and political importance are disposed of, and the comparatively numerous inaccuracies in reference to persons and facts, which render it unlikely that these Chronicles were compiled by the same person as the Chronicle for 1377 to 1392 in the Royal MS.¹

¹ The peculiar passages of the first Cambridge Chronicle are given by Riley as an Appendix to the Historia Anglicana, ii. 411-24.

Riley's opinion was accepted by Sir E. M. Thompson.² But Dr. James Gairdner, in his Early Chronicles,³ writes :

'The evidences adduced for this extraordinary opinion seem to me singularly weak. It is quite true that one manuscript of the history terminates in the year 1392, and that after that date the narrative is for some years less full and satisfactory. But a sufficient explanation of this may, I think, be found in the personal history of the author.'

When Walsingham returned from Wymondham to St. Albans, 'he would naturally resume those literary labours which had been interrupted by duties elsewhere.'

Dr. Gairdner can see

'nothing in the nature of internal evidence to create a doubt that the writer of the history during the reigns of Henry IV and Henry V is the same as the writer of the history in Richard II's time. On the contrary the style is the same throughout'.

The question is not one that is susceptible of proof, and the answer must remain a matter of opinion. My own opinion is on the same side as Dr. Gairdner's. Riley seems to lay too much stress on the errors of fact and names. They are such as might befall a writer who had not been careful to verify all details ; if further explanation is needed it may be enough to remember that Walsingham was an old man when he completed his work. Such as the errors are, some are repeated, and a few are corrected, in the Ypodigma Neustriæ, which is avowedly a genuine work of Walsingham. Two, which would be perhaps the most important, exist only in Riley's imagination. The death of Archbishop Arundel is placed correctly in the Historia Anglicana under February 1414; it is Riley who is wrong in assigning it to 1413; nor does the writer (as Riley alleges) say that Stephen Patrington became Bishop of St. Davids in 1414, but only that he succeeded Chichele, which is correct.⁴ Moreover, the Ypodigma Neustriæ, which was written in 1419, for the previous nineteen years agrees

¹ Hist. Angl. ii. pp. vii-ix, xv, xvi.

² Chronicon Angliæ, pp. xxxi, xxxii.

³ p. 262.

⁴ Hist. Angl. ii. 300; cf. p. xvi n.

very closely with the Historia Anglicana, and like it was for the most part derived from the third Chronicle of the Cambridge MS. Walsingham wrote it for Henry V, and it seems hardly probable that in a work intended for presentation to the King, he, who was the foremost and most practised writer of his abbey, should have been content to follow so slavishly the work of a younger colleague of his own. In the Ypodigma, under date 1405, Walsingham relates that the Danish Bishop of Anselowe, during a visit to the abbey, talked with the 'scriptor praesentis Chronicae', about the life of St. Alban.¹ The passage is identical with one in the Historia Anglicana.² In a corresponding passage in the *Annales Henrici Quarti*³ the expression used is 'qui mecum diu contulit de Sancto Albano'. The variation may suggest that the writer of the Annales was a different person from the author of the Historia Anglicana, though both had talked with the bishop; but the sentence as it stands in the Historia and the Ypodigma is ungrammatical, a circumstance which, taken with its identity of form, seems to make it incredible that Walsingham should have borrowed it from another man's work, though he might have reproduced it from a work of his own. For myself, therefore, I would accept the Ypodigma as proof for the authorship of the Historia Anglicana by Walsingham, and further suggest that Riley's admission that Walsingham might also have been the compiler of the first and third Chronicles of the Cambridge MS. is very probably correct. The narrative for the last three years of the Historia Anglicana, 1419 to 1422, stands on a somewhat different footing, since it does not appear in the Ypodigma. But it is found both in the Cambridge and in the Arundel MSS., and in its general character resembles the rest of the work. I therefore see no reason for supposing that it was of different authorship.

Walsingham's Historia Anglicana is a somewhat dry and annalistic work with no particular literary merit. In his earlier writings, as notably in the Chronicon Angliae for 1328 to 1388, he had shown some political partisanship, and by his subsequent alterations a capacity for time-serving. In the

¹ Ypodigma, p. 415.

² Hist. Angl. ii. 271.

³ Annales, p. 412.

Historia he does not seem to have written with any ulterior object, or to display any more bias than is to be expected in a monastic historian, when he has to deal with questions touching ecclesiastical interests. For the first part of his work, down to 1406, the material is derived ultimately from the Annales Henrici Quarti with a few slight variations. The only additions of importance are as to the treasonable conduct of the Countess of Oxford in 1404,¹ and the altercation of Archbishop Arundel with the Speaker (wrongly called Sir John Cheyne) in the Parliament of that year.² Of this part of the work I will therefore say no more.

In the Historia Anglicana the last seven years of Henry IV fill only sixteen pages. The nine years of Henry V (in spite of a gap from August 1418 to July 1419) take fifty-seven. The first portion is therefore much more brief, and for the most part it is little more than a bare record of facts in chronological order. In matter it resembles closely the Chronicle of Thomas Otterbourne,³ and since the latter is here at times the fuller it may be conjectured that both had a longer common original. The most important passages relate to ecclesiastical affairs. There is a long notice of the Council of Pisa, which is followed by accounts of the execution of John Badby, and of the attempted Lollard legislation in the Parliament of 1410.⁴ The record of this legislation was deliberately withdrawn from the Roll of the Parliament, and Walsingham's narrative was consequently the only one available of earlier date than Fabyan till the printing of the English text of the Bill in the Chronicles of London.⁵ Walsingham gives a Latin version of the opening clause, which helps to confirm the authenticity of the English. His account is further of interest for the statements that the Lollards failed to justify the exaggerated financial basis of their scheme, and that it was defeated by the opposition of the Prince. Upon the English interference in France in 1411-12 Walsingham's History is interesting; but it requires to be supplemented from other sources, and gives no indication of the bearing of these events on the conflict between the King and his son.⁶

¹ Hist. Angl. ii. 262.

² Id. ii. 265.

³ See pp. 21, 22 below.

⁴ Hist. Angl. ii. 280-83.

⁵ pp. 65, 295-6.

⁶ Hist. Angl. ii. 285-8.

For the first two years of Henry V the Historia Anglicana is similar in character to its narrative of the previous reign. Its chief features are a lengthy account of the trial of Oldcastle,¹ which is, however, inferior in value to the more complete records in the Fasciculi Zizaniorum, and Wilkins's Concilia; and a notice on the earlier stages of the Council of Constance.² A statement as to the implication of Oldcastle and the Lollards in the Scrope and Cambridge plot of 1415³ is of more importance.

With the beginning of the French war the Historia assumes a different character. Notices of events in England, apart from valuable details on Oldcastle's later career and death,⁴ are brief and trivial. They are interspersed in a succession of long passages on the war, which though unequal in value to the continuous narrative of the set biographies of Henry V, are of independent origin, and contain details not given in other accounts. Walsingham of course could not write from any personal knowledge, but he clearly used material supplied from an authoritative source. The narrative of the siege of Harfleur is brief, that of its surrender is peculiar.⁵ The accounts of the march to Agincourt and of the battle, though inferior to those in the Gesta Henrici Quinti, supply some additional details and deserve attention.⁶ For the fighting round Harfleur in 1416 Walsingham's account is again of value.⁷ For the siege of Caen in 1417 he has material not to be found elsewhere; especially for the ruse by which Clarence captured the Abbey of St. Stephen, preventing thereby its intended destruction, and for the circumstances of the final assault.⁸ The subsequent notices for 1417-18 are brief and of no special value. The history stops short at the beginning of the siege of Rouen, and without any sign of omission resumes at the taking of Pontoise a twelvemonth later.⁹ The events which led up to the Treaty of Troyes, and the subsequent operations of the war, are dealt with very briefly. The most important parts of the Historia for the last two years relate to Henry's last visit to England, and his death and

¹ Hist. Angl. ii. 291-7.

⁴ Id. ii. 326-8.

⁷ Id. ii. 314-15.

² Id. ii. 302-4.

⁵ Id. ii. 307-9.

⁸ Id. ii. 322-5.

³ Id. ii. 306.

⁶ Id. ii. 309-14.

⁹ Id. ii. 329.

burial.¹ There are two long digressions; one on the chapter of the Benedictines at Westminster in 1421,² and the other on the warfare of Sigismund in Bohemia.³ Though the narrative for the reign of Henry V is broken and imperfect, the detailed accounts of isolated incidents and its fullness on some matters indicate that we have in it the original work of the St. Albans scriptorium, and not, as in some of the previous parts of the work, an abbreviated compilation from longer versions.

Throughout the Historia Anglicana lacks continuity, and its chief value consists in isolated passages. But apart from those portions which relate to Oldcastle and the Lollards it is free from bias. It appears to be based on good information and to be trustworthy. It is, moreover, the chief Chronicle which covers the whole of these two reigns, and must always continue to be an authority of weight. It is often quoted by Stow and Holinshed, through whom it has contributed much to the established history of England. It was first printed under the care of Archbishop Parker in 1574.

The *Ypodigma Neustriæ*⁴ calls only for brief notice. Walsingham wrote it in 1419, and dedicated it to Henry V as a manual of the history of Normandy from the time of Rollo to its recovery by the King in the sixth year of his reign. We are only concerned with the last portion from 1399 to 1419. For the reign of Henry IV it is an abbreviation of the Historia Anglicana, with some omissions and occasional verbal variations. A solitary insertion is a notice of the death of Edmund, Duke of York, borrowed from the Annales Henrici Quarti; ⁵ from the same source a blank in the Historia, on p. 259, is made good by inserting 'Cantuariensis'.⁶ For the reign of Henry V the text of the Historia is rigidly adhered to, except that in one or two places a few words are supplied from the Cambridge MS.⁷ Like the Historia the Ypodigma passes over the siege of Rouen. It ends with the capture of Pontoise in 1419. The practical identity of the text of the Ypodigma (which preserves even trivial notices relating to

¹ Hist. Angl. ii. 336-7, 343-6.

² Id. ii. 337-8.

³ Id. ii. 341.

⁴ First printed in 1574; edited by H. T. Riley in the Rolls Series, 1876.

⁵ Ypodigma, p. 395.

⁶ Id. p. 403.

⁷ Id. pp. 460, 488.

St. Albans) with that of the Historia Anglicana appears to afford a strong presumption that Walsingham was author of them both. If he were not he must have lost in his old age all sense of the duty and dignity of an historian. Apart from this the Ypodigma has for our present purpose no value whatever.

The *Annales Henrici Quarti*¹ cover the years 1399 to 1406. They are for this period deservedly pronounced by their editor, H. T. Riley, to be the most valuable memorial that we now possess. They are contained in Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, MS. 7, and, as already noted, form the original of the other two Chronicles contained in that volume, which Walsingham made use of for the Historia Anglicana. The Annales Henrici Quarti are written as a Continuation of the Annales Ricardi Secundi in the same volume, though there is some evidence for supposing that the annals for the earlier reign had been in circulation separately. The beginning of the Annales Henrici Quarti coincides very nearly in date with Walsingham's return to St. Albans, and the possibility that he was responsible for their compilation is not, I think, altogether to be rejected. As noted just now, Walsingham made some slight use of them in the Ypodigma Neustriæ. His failure to employ them more fully in the compilation of the Historia Anglicana was not therefore due to ignorance; probably it was deliberate, and not, as Riley suggested, a mere oversight. It would be quite in accordance with Walsingham's earlier manner to have written in the first instance a detailed history, and subsequently to have extracted from it a shortened version. However, it must be observed that at the beginning of the Cambridge MS. there is a note that the collection of Chronicles therein contained was found at the death of Dom William Wyntershulle by Dom Robert Ware in loose sheets, and by him collected together. Wyntershulle, who died about 1424, is described as a man of great learning; but though Riley conjectured that the contents of the volume may have been compiled under Wyntershulle's direction, there is no real evidence to support this theory.

¹ ap. Trokelowe, Blaneфорde et Anonymorum Chronica, pp. 281-420; ed. H. T. Riley in the Rolls Series.

It is at least as likely that the sheets only came into Wyntershyll's possession a few years earlier, at the death of Walsingham. I see no necessary objection to Walsingham's authorship in the point of style; the arguments as to neglect of matters of high interest will at all events not apply to the Annales; whilst the fact that those errors on which Riley laid such stress, so far as they belong to these years, are perpetrated for the first time in the Annales, shows that an otherwise praiseworthy historian may fall into slight inaccuracies.¹ However, we can say no more for certain than that the Annales Henrici Quarti represent in the fullest and most authoritative form the work of the St. Albans scriptorium, at a time when Walsingham had probably resumed his superintendence of it.

Riley has described at length² the points in which the Annales excel the Historia Anglicana, and I need not go over the ground again in detail. The work opens with the documents relating to Henry's coronation and first Parliament, which are found elsewhere, as in the Vita Ricardi by the Monk of Evesham, in the Chronicles of Otterbourne and Adam Usk, in the Rolls of Parliament, and in an English version in some of the London Chronicles.³ The last alone can compare for fullness with the Annales. The frequency with which these lengthy documents occur suggests that they were circulated deliberately by the new government. Of subsequent incidents the Annales are most important for the insurrection of the Earls in 1400; the circumstances of the death and burial of Richard II; the battle of Shrewsbury, and the movements of the Earl of Northumberland; the hostile incursions of the Bretons in the south of England, and the exploits of Harry Pay of Poole; the Parliament at Coventry in 1404; the accusation brought against Edward of York by his sister Constance Despencer; the insurrection of Archbishop Scrope and the Earl Marshal; and Northumberland's rebellious conduct in 1405. For the most part the Annales differ from the Historia Anglicana only in their greater fullness of detail, though this of course is the very essence of their superiority. But sometimes they include matter for which there is nothing to correspond in the Historia, such as Archbishop Scrope's statement of grievances, and a curious notice of the discovery of the Canary Islands by the Spaniards. For the Unlearned Parliament at Coventry the sources of the Annales and Historia appear to be distinct; though each has matter not to be found in the other, the Annales are the more valuable. This is the only important point on which the Annales require to be supplemented by the Historia. From a contemporary note,¹ 'Christe, tibi supplico, destrue Glendor,' it would appear that the Annales were written whilst Owen Glendower was still dangerous, i.e. before 1408.

¹ Two very similar errors occur in the peculiar portions of the Annales, see p. 22 below.

² Preface, pp. xxxiii-xli.

³ See p. 87 below.

Nearly related both to the Annales and to the Historia Anglicana is the Chronicle of Thomas Otterbourne, which was edited by Hearne in 1732. Otterbourne has been described as a Franciscan, but this seems to be due to confusion with a friar of that name, who was reader of his order at Oxford about 1350.² Nothing is really known about him, though from certain characteristics of his Chronicle he appears, as his name implies, to have been of northern origin. He may possibly be identical with the Thomas Otterbourne who became rector of Chingford in 1393. His Chronicle begins with the earliest times and ends abruptly in 1420. Nearly one-half is devoted to the reigns of Richard II, Henry IV, and Henry V, for all of which period it is in some sense contemporary. The part with which we are concerned is short, and resembles closely the Historia Anglicana. Nevertheless, it is at times the fuller, and therefore, as already suggested, the two Chronicles may for the reign of Henry IV have had a common original more detailed than either. In the account of the revolution of 1399, and for the subsequent seven years, Otterbourne's Chronicle resembles the Annales more closely than the Historia, and was evidently derived from a copy of the former work. Though much abbreviated it supplies occasional small corrections as 'domino Radulpho de Lumley' on p. 226 for the 'domino . . . Bunney' of the Annales, and 'Janico de Arteys' on p. 230 for the obviously corrupt 'Ranico'. On the siege of Berwick by Henry IV in 1405 something is added from another source;¹ this may be due to the writer's probable Northumbrian connexion, and is possibly derived from the same original as the account in the Northern Chronicle printed in this volume.² Similarly the notice of Northumberland's defeat at Bramham Moor in 1408 is fuller than that in the Historia Anglicana;³ in this latter case there does not seem to be any connexion between Otterbourne and the Northern Chronicle.⁴ The chief points on which Otterbourne supplements the Historia Anglicana for the reign of Henry IV relate to the siege of Aberystwith, the King's illness in 1408, and the death of the Earl of Kent at St. Briec in Brittany (where the mistake of calling the earl Thomas appears as in Walsingham⁵). None of these are of much importance, but the last-named is of interest because it seems to be derived from the same source as the account in the Brut.⁶ The original of the Brut seems also to have supplied Otterbourne with the material for his account of the events of 1412.⁷ But Otterbourne has preserved some details not found in the other extant narratives, such as the King's intention to take the field in person, the offence given to the Prince by the reversal of his policy, his quarrel with his father and subsequent reconciliation.⁸ The difference between the King and Prince is not to be minimized; in their divergence of opinion as to the line to be taken in intervention in France, whether on the side of Burgundy or of Orleans, we get a clue to much of the politics not only of the following reign but of the next generation. For this incident Otterbourne is one of our earliest and most important authorities.

¹ On p. 374.

² See Little, Greyfriars in Oxford, pp. 174-5, and Dict. Nat. Biog. xlii. 341.

For the reign of Henry V Otterbourne's Chronicle preserves the same characteristics of close resemblance to the Historia Anglicana with occasional additions; only there is now no

¹ p. 257; Annales, p. 414.

² p. 262; Hist. Angl. ii. 278.

³ pp. 262, 263.

⁷ See p. 116 below.

² See pp. 282-3 below.

⁴ See p. 283 below.

⁶ Brut, p. 368.

⁸ pp. 270-2.

indication of a longer common original. Otterbourne is very brief on the history of Oldcastle and the Council of Constance, whilst for the main incidents of the French war he is very inferior and adds nothing. The text fills only ten pages, as compared with fifty for the previous reign. The mention of the capture of the Earl of Fife in 1415, and of some incidents relating to the Foul Raid by the Scots in 1417 are peculiar,¹ and point again to the writer having had some information of Northumbrian origin. But the only additions of special interest are two stories relating to Henry V, which may come from the same source as the account of his quarrel with his father in 1412. The first is of the sending of tennis-balls by the Dauphin;² this is authenticated by the statement that it was in Lent 1414 whilst Henry was at Kenilworth, where he was certainly present in February of that year. The other is of how Vincent Ferrier, the Dominican, came to preach before Henry at Caen in 1418,³ an authentic story to which I shall allude in another place. Otterbourne also inserts a brief account of the siege of Rouen, relating chiefly to the price of food in the city.⁴ The concluding paragraph, which is imperfect, belongs to 1419-20, and is derived from the Historia Anglicana. Probably we may therefore put the date of composition at least as late as 1423, since the Historia was not finished before that year. The only ancient manuscript is Harley 3643, which dates from the fifteenth century, and was formerly at Eton College. Hearne's text was printed from a copy of Cotton. Vitellius F ix, which is a transcript made in the sixteenth century. Some use was made of the Chronicle by John Stow.⁵

The Chronicle of the Reign of Henry IV, edited by J. A. Giles in 1846, is a compilation which must be considered in connexion with the Vita Ricardi Secundi by a Monk of Evesham, edited by Thomas Hearne in 1729. The latter work, which includes a continuation coming down to the end of 1402, is described by Sir E. M. Thompson as one of those

¹ pp. 277-9.

² p. 274.

³ p. 280; see p. 67 below.

⁴ p. 282.

⁵ His translation 'taken out of the cronicle that somtyme belongyd to Eaton Colledge' is in Harley MS. 6223 at the British Museum.

works which grew by accumulation: it is most commonly found as a continuation appended to Higden's Polychronicon; ¹ Hearne edited it from two manuscripts in the British Museum, viz. Cotton. Tiberius C ix, and Cotton. Claudius B ix.² The former manuscript, which was much damaged by the great fire in 1731, is probably rather the more ancient. It includes an appendix (wanting in the Claudius MS.), which gives some of the documents relating to the deposition of Richard II and ends with a note of the death and burial of Henry IV. But whilst this copy must thus have been written as late as 1413, the date of the composition of the main text was certainly earlier, since in several places ³ reference is made to Henry IV as 'Rex qui nunc est'. Probably the date of composition was not long after 1402. But it may be as late as 1404; since reference is made on p. 162 to the punishment of the murderers of Thomas of Gloucester, and William Serle was not executed till that year. For the three years of the reign of Henry IV, which it thus covers, the work of the Monk of Evesham is of the first importance. It gives a detailed account of the revolution of 1399, with copies of the documents, though not so fully as in the Annales of the St. Albans writer. But the circumstantial notices of events at Cirencester during the abortive rising of Richard's supporters, and of the attempted escape of Despencer and his execution at Bristol, are independent and interesting. For the beginning of Glendower's revolt, and for events on the Welsh border, it is one of our most valuable authorities. These passages are of the more value since their authentic character is confirmed by the fact that the writer, as a monk of Evesham, was in a position to obtain good local information, and through the repeated visits of the King to his abbey, which he duly records,⁴ was in touch with persons in authority.

Giles printed his Chronicle from transcripts made by Henry Petrie from Royal MS. 13, C i, and Sloane MS. 1776. Of these manuscripts I shall have more to say in another place; ⁵

¹ Chronicon Angliae, p. xxxiii.

² For some account of another copy, see p. 342 below.

³ pp. 162, 163.

⁴ pp. 173, 176, 'in hoc monasterio.' See also p. 170, 'pestilentia, maxime in valle Euesham.'

⁵ See p. 155 below.

here it is enough to state that they were written about 1460, though for the reign of Henry IV they probably reproduce with slight, if any, variation some older chronicle. Both manuscripts contain a history of the reign of Richard II, to which the history of Henry IV is a deliberate continuation. Giles omitted the history of Richard II because it is 'similar even in phraseology to the Vita Ricardi Secundi published by Hearne'. This statement is broadly correct, but does not tell the whole truth. For though the later writer abridged his narrative for the earlier part of the reign from the Evesham Chronicle, he interpolated occasionally some matter of his own, and for the later years followed instead the Annales Ricardi Secundi of the St. Albans chronicler. So the first paragraph of Giles's Chronicle is verbally identical with one in the Annales, whether we regard it as the last of Richard II or the first of Henry IV. The Monk of Evesham had himself made use of a St. Albans Chronicle. It is for these reasons that I conjectured above that the Annales Ricardi Secundi may have been circulated separately.

After the opening paragraph Giles's Chronicle reverts to the Evesham Chronicle, which it follows in the main down to 1402; but with a good deal of abridgement in places, and occasional additions from other sources. Some, though not all, of the Evesham notices are omitted, as also are the references to Henry IV as 'Rex qui nunc est'; one passage, in which Henry is spoken of as 'tunc duce Lancastriae, nunc Rege', is a quotation from an official document. Apart from small details the only addition is the discourse of W. Ferriby on Richard's fall, which, though considerable in length, is of no historic value.¹ The latter part of Giles's Chronicle, from 1403 to 1413, is of a different character. It is certainly not derived from a West-Midland source, and appears rather to be the work of a London writer. In many places it seems to have a common original with the English Chronicles of London. In the account of the battle of Shrewsbury (which is fairly detailed) 'quia pater contra filium et filius adversus patrem, et servus contra dominum decertare noscuntur' is clearly identical with 'there was fadyr ayenst the sone, and the sone ayenst the fadyr' of Gregory's Chronicle.¹ It resembles also the London Chronicles in the notices of the death of Sir Robert Knolles and of the destruction of the weirs on the Thames and Medway in 1406, of the death of the Earl of Kent at St. Briec in 1408, of the jousting of the Seneschal of Hainault in 1409, and of the incidents of Arthur the Squire and the execution of Rhys ap Die in 1410 and 1411, and of the coinage of 1412.² It seems, however, to reproduce the common original more fully than do most of the London Chronicles. It may also have a like original for the notice of the French expedition of 1412.³ One of the most valuable passages in the Chronicle is the detailed description of the execution of Archbishop Scrope in 1406; this includes the archbishop's conversation with John Malvern, the physician, who was probably the writer's informant; since Malvern was parson of St. Dunstan's by the Tower in London, we have another suggestion of London authorship.⁴ The writer apparently had access to official sources, and for the Parliaments of 1404 and 1406 quotes the records.⁵ Of the later events of the Welsh war he has little to say except that he preserves the curious document of the Tripartite Convention for a division of England between Northumberland, Mortimer, and Glendower.⁶

¹ pp. 11-18.

Tyler in his Memoirs of Henry V,⁷ published in 1838, argued strongly against the credibility of the Chronicle, which Giles printed eight years later. He contended that the writer was a foreigner, and one whose feelings were opposed to the Lancastrian dynasty. The first of these theories rests on a rather thin argument from the occasional substitution of 'the English' for 'we English', or 'us', and may, I think, be safely dismissed; the Chronicle has certainly a very close connexion with other narratives, which are of indubitable English origin. For the theory that the writer was anti-

¹ p. 33; Gregory's Chronicle, p. 103; see also Brut, p. 549.

² pp. 49, 54, 55, 60, 63; Gregory's Chronicle, pp. 104-6; Chronicles of London, pp. 64, 68; Nicolas, Lond. Chronicle, pp. 90-4.

³ p. 61.

⁴ pp. 45, 46.

⁵ pp. 35-9, 49-52.

⁶ pp. 39-42; this is the only contemporary Chronicle which mentions the Convention; there is a possible reference to it in Rot. Parl. iii. 612, under date December 2, 1407. A century later Hall (Chronicle, p. 28) refers to it, but places it before the battle of Shrewsbury. ⁷ Vol. ii, pp. 425-44.

Lancastrian there is a little more evidence; Glendower is called 'venerabilem et decentem armigerum', the epithets being an insertion which does not appear in the Evesham Chronicle; ¹ the sending back of Richard's Queen Isabella without her dowry is commented on unfavourably in another insertion.² For these, however, it is perhaps a sufficient explanation that the Chronicle was composed at least a dozen years later than the Evesham Vita Ricardi. The Chronicle is no doubt at fault in some points of chronology, as in the insertion of the creation of Henry of Monmouth to be Duke of Cornwall in 1401,³ and the description of the French expedition of 1411 under the thirteenth instead of the twelfth year of Henry IV; but though the expedition was arranged in the twelfth, its main events fell in the thirteenth year, to which the greater part of the French affair is correctly ascribed. Tyler's adverse criticism is due to his desire to discredit the chronicler's accounts of the Tripartite Convention, and of the dispute between Henry IV and his son in 1411-12. But as regards the first of these incidents I agree with Dr. Wylie's argument that it is correctly placed by the Chronicle after the battle of Shrewsbury, and not before; the error probably consists in dating it a year too soon, in 1405 instead of 1406.⁴ As for the second matter, the dispute of the Prince and King, and the projected forced abdication of the latter are well accredited; though the chronology of the Chronicle is somewhat confused, it is clear from the context, which describes how the Prince subsequently made a progress through England to collect support, that it must intend the Parliament of November 1411, and that the writer has not, as Tyler supposed, made any confusion with the Parliament of February 1413.

The earliest possible date for the compilation of Giles's Chronicle is fixed by a reference to the deposition of Pope John XXIII at the Council of Constance,⁵ which was on May 29, 1415. The London Chronicles and the Brut, with both of which this Chronicle is connected, probably began to take shape about that date or a little later. If we suppose

¹ p. 20; Vita, p. 170.

⁴ Wylie, Henry IV, vol. ii, pp. 378-81.

² p. 25.

³ p. 23.

⁵ p. 58.

that Giles's Chronicle was compiled some years afterwards, we shall have a sufficient explanation of its faulty chronology. Apart from its imperfections it may be accepted as a useful authority, though it requires to be checked by comparison with other narratives.

The Chronicles with which we have so far been concerned are more or less closely connected with the St. Albans school. The last part of Giles's Chronicle, and in a less degree Otterbourne, have introduced us to an English source of London origin. This we can trace with greater distinctness in the brief account of the reign of Henry IV which is given in the Continuation of the Eulogium Historiarum. The main text of the Eulogium ends in 1366, and was probably written at Malmesbury. The Continuation, which is found in a single manuscript—Cotton. Galba E vii, at the British Museum—extends from 1364 to 1413; it is added without any break at the end of the original work. F. R. Haydon, who edited it in 1863 for the Rolls Series, was of opinion on internal evidence that it may have been written at Canterbury.¹ The chief points by which this conjecture can be supported relate to the reign of Richard II. But the Continuation in its present form is certainly a composite and not an original work; it would therefore be hazardous to draw any positive conclusion as to the place in which the existing compilation was made. The small amount of peculiar matter contained in its latter portion includes a reference to a portentous flight of crows and starlings in Somerset in 1404;² this may, however, be an interpolation made by a west-country compiler when putting together material derived from various sources.

The Continuation of the Eulogium as it now stands cannot have been finished till after 1428; since under date 1384³ reference is made to the exhumation of Wiclif's remains. On the other hand, one source must have been written before 1404; since under date 1382 Philip the Hardy, Duke of Burgundy, is spoken of as still alive.⁴ This would be sufficient ¹ Preface to vol. iii, p. lii. The Continuation is contained in vol. iii, pp. 333-421.

² Eulogium, iii. 403.

³ Id. iii. 367; cf. Davies's Chron. p. 6.

⁴ Eulogium, iii. 355; in Davies's Chron. p. 3 the reference is different.

to prove the composite character of the existing Chronicle. The internal evidence is confirmed by comparison with the Southern Chronicle,¹ which I shall describe presently; that work is from 1367 to 1401, derived clearly from the same source as the Continuation. This common original appears also in the peculiar version of the English Brut, which is known as Davies's Chronicle.² But whilst the resemblance of the Continuation to the Southern Chronicle ceases in 1401, the resemblance to Davies's Chronicle continues to the end. The earlier part of Davies's Chronicle, as I shall show later on,³ was founded upon an original compiled about 1437; but that original was itself derived from more than one source. Of these earlier sources one was no doubt the Latin Chronicle (possibly of Canterbury origin), which ended in 1401. Since the resemblance of the Continuation to Davies's Chronicle after 1405 is not so close as before, it is possible that another of the common originals may have ended about this date. But even for the last eight years of the reign of Henry IV it is clear that both the existing Chronicles come in part from the same source. There are, however, a number of passages where the Continuation contains matter not found in the English Chronicle.⁴ Of these passages several, as the notice of Sautre, Homildon Hill, the verses for the

¹ See pp. 31, 32 below.

² An English Chronicle, 1377-1461, edited for the Camden Society by the Rev. J. S. Davies in 1856.

³ See pp. 127, 128 below.

⁴ In view of their importance in other connexions, and especially for the history of the Brut, it will be useful to specify these passages here.—The King's loan from the Londoners, p. 387; the fate of William Sautre, p. 388; the friar of Norfolk and the chapter of the Franciscans at Leicester, p. 389; the friar and the fool at Bristol, pp. 393-4; the friars executed at Lichfield, p. 394; an informer friar killed in Wales, p. 394; Homildon Hill and the events of 1403, p. 395; the northern hermit executed, p. 397; memorial verses for the battle of Shrewsbury, p. 398; the King in Wales and Percy's Scottish prisoners, p. 398; the Duke of Orleans at Bordeaux, the French attack on the Isle of Wight, and part of the Parliament of 1404, p. 399; the aliens dismissed, p. 400; the battle of Mark, p. 401; the treason of the Countess of Oxford, p. 401; the abduction of the Earl of March and imprisonment of the Duke of York, p. 402; the portentous flight of crows, and the Breton raid of 1404, p. 403; a story of the Franciscan friars of London, pp. 403-5; the friars of York, p. 407; sieges of Berwick and Coyty, p. 408; events of 1406, p. 409; nearly all the history of 1407-11, pp. 410-18; the notices of the first year of Henry V, p. 421.

battle of Shrewsbury, and the battle of Mark, are found in the copy of the Brut in Harley MS. 53, which seems to represent one of the English originals of Davies's Chronicle.¹ Of the other incidents it will be observed that many relate to stories of the Franciscan Friars; it is for other stories of the same character that the Continuation and Davies's Chronicle are most noteworthy; it is possible that one original may have been a Franciscan compilation.² In the matter common to the two Chronicles the Continuation occasionally preserves some small details not found in Davies's Chronicle,³ whilst the latter in its turn has also something peculiar. The more independent part of the Continuation from 1407 to 1411 is concerned chiefly with papal history; besides some things found in Davies's Chronicle it also includes a little which is not found there but appears in other versions of the Brut.⁴ With the events of 1411-12 the more precise resemblance of the two Chronicles is resumed, though as before they supplement one another.

The foregoing comparison has revealed not merely the close connexion of the two Chronicles, but also points of dissimilarity which indicate that they were derived independently from their common source. It is only on the theory of independent derivation that we can explain the appearance of matter in the Continuation which is not given in Davies's Chronicle but is to be found in the probable English source of the latter work. As for the character of the ultimate original the evidence of the Southern Chronicle would seem to show that down to 1401 it was a brief Latin Chronicle possibly of Canterbury origin; at all events the Continuation and the Southern Chronicle have a common Latin source. Whether the original from 1402 to 1413 was written in Latin or in English is less clear. But the points in which the

¹ See p. 123 below; and compare Brut, pp. 548-50.

² The latest Franciscan reference (on p. 413) belongs to 1408. It is peculiar to the Continuation.

³ Such as the reference to the Welsh as 'scurrae nudipedes', and the mention of Anglesey on p. 388; the phrase 'ad suggestionem amicorum mulier pacificata ab accusatione cessavit' on p. 389; the passage 'et statutus est' to 'clamabat causas eorum' on pp. 390-1; and the references to Bridlington and Highgate on pp. 391 and 393.

⁴ e.g. the death of the Earl of Kent, and the execution of Badby on pp. 413, 416; compare Brut, p. 369, Chronicles of London, p. 68, and Gregory's Chronicle, p. 105.

Continuation resembles other versions of the Brut than Davies's Chronicle incline me to the opinion that in this part of his work the compiler made use of an English original. The Continuation was certainly not written till after 1428, and so far as the hand of the solitary manuscript gives us any assistance might well be dated a dozen years later. By that time the Brut was well established in its English form. The material for the reign of Henry IV which is most distinctive of the English Brut is found only in Latin Chronicles which, like the Continuation, are of comparatively late date and not improbably derived from an English source.¹ Some of the English versions, on the other hand, probably date from the reign of Henry V.² The fact that the Continuation ends with 1413 is rather to be taken as evidence for an English Chronicle which ended at that date than as affording any proof of the existence of a Latin original.

It will have been obvious that the Continuation of the Eulogium is most valuable for the purpose of textual comparison with other Chronicles, and in particular for the light which it throws on the early history of the Chronicles of London and the Brut. Still, though most of its contents are to be found in kindred Chronicles, it is sometimes useful for small details in places where it seems to represent better the more strictly contemporary original.

In dealing with the Continuation of the Eulogium it has been necessary to refer to a brief work, the latter part of which is printed in this volume for the first time, under the title of A Southern Chronicle,³ from Additional MS. 11714 in the British Museum. The complete Chronicle begins from the earliest times, but is brief and unimportant down to 1367. From this point to 1401, as already noted, it is derived from the same original as the Continuation. The verbal resemblances are so close that in spite of some differences of arrangement there can be no question as to the relationship. The Southern Chronicle is much abbreviated (though with occasional small additions). It does not contain the Canterbury references, nor the curious anecdotal stories about the conspiracy of the Earls in 1400; since, however, these are given both in the Continuation and in Davies's Chronicle they may be assumed to come from the common original. The Southern Chronicle resembles the Continuation in having a notice of the execution of William Sautre, which does not appear in Davies's Chronicle. The reference to William Ferriby is peculiar; this and some small variations may be due to the ultimate compiler. The concluding part of the Southern Chronicle from 1402 to 1422 differs so completely from the Continuation as to preclude any idea that they can have borrowed from one another or be in any way connected. It would seem to be an independent work, which was added as a continuation to an abbreviation of the original which ended in 1401. It contains nothing of note except for a commendation of Henry IV, and a reference to the youthful wildness of Henry V which is a little more explicit than usual. It has the air of having been written from memory by a tolerably well-informed person. This would explain its vagueness, and such curious errors as the statement that the Dauphin was killed at Agincourt. The writer was clearly an ecclesiastic; perhaps, to judge from the prominence which he gives to the visit of Sigismund, a Londoner. The southern origin of the Chronicle seems to be marked by the references to 'partes occidentales' and 'partes boriales'. There are some phrases which suggest that the writer could have expressed himself more readily in English. At all events, it is a specimen of the Latin mediaeval Chronicle in its decadence, and though of some slight literary interest, has little value for history.

¹ See pp. 22, 25, 26 above, and 311 sqq., 342, 351-2 below.

² See pp. 133 and 299-301 below. ³ See pp. 275-8 below.

Quite apart from all the histories of which we have yet treated stands the Chronicle of Adam Usk; which, though written at the end of a copy of Higden's Polychronicon as a continuation of that work, approaches rather in the character of its composition to a modern volume of reminiscences. It is stamped throughout by its author's personality, and to a great extent follows the changes of his career. Hence, though we do not get a properly reasoned history of the time, we have a more literary composition, which is often of peculiar interest since it describes the writer's own impressions, whether truthful or not, of events which he witnessed, or in which he had even played some part. It begins with the reign of Richard II, and ends in the summer of 1421. Of the first seventeen years Usk's history is meagre; he tells us that he set it not in the order of years, having stored in his memory what he heard and saw rather with regard to the truth of the events than to the time when they took place.¹

Usk had been an Oxford student and teacher, and like a hot-headed Welshman mixed himself up in the riots of the northern and southern scholars in 1388, for which, as he naïvely confesses, he was indicted, not undeservedly, as the ringleader of his party. Nevertheless, he continued at Oxford some years as a lecturer in civil law, and then left to practise his profession in the court of Canterbury. He was present as a lawyer in the Parliaments of 1397 and 1399, of both of which he gives a detailed account. During the next three years he was employed as counsel in various legal suits, sometimes in the King's behalf. Then in 1402 he got into trouble for horse-stealing, and found it expedient to leave the country; though he modestly left the reason to be discovered in modern times by a record in the Patent Rolls.² For an ecclesiastical lawyer Rome was the most promising haven of refuge. Of his journey thither Usk has left us an interesting summary of how he travelled up the Rhine to Lucerne with its wondrous lake (an uncommon early instance of appreciation of Swiss scenery), and so crossed the St. Gothard in an ox-wagon, blindfold that he might not see the dangers of the road, and half-dead with cold. At Rome for four years he practised successfully as a lawyer in the Papal Court. Then came evil days, and he turned homewards; but at Bruges he was warned that it would not be prudent to venture into England. For two years longer he wandered abroad, tempted by the exiled Earl of Northumberland to join forces with him, and perhaps intriguing with his countryman Glendower. At last, in 1408, he formed a scheme with Lancaster King-of-Arms, whom he met at Paris, to cross to Wales, feign to be Owen's man, and when the chance offered to steal away and seek the King's pardon. The plan was put into execution, and Usk spent several months skulking in the hills of Merioneth. Glendower suspected him, and it was with difficulty that he at last escaped. Even then he could not obtain pardon, till after three years, for his treasonable adherence to rebels and for his past felonies and transgressions. He lived for eighteen years longer (till 1430) in a more or less honoured old age.

¹ Chronicon, p. 8.

² Thompson, Preface, p. xxi.

This sketch of Adam Usk's career gives an idea of what may be expected of his Chronicle. The most valuable portions are the story of the fall of Richard II, which he witnessed in the train of Archbishop Arundel; the narrative of occurrences at Rome during his residence there; and the Welsh war, in which he took a peculiar interest, even whilst at Rome receiving and recording reports of events in his native country. Documents incidental to his professional career fill a good many of his pages. Of more general interest are the outspoken letter of remonstrance addressed by Philip Repingdon to the King in 1401,¹ which gives voice to the popular disappointment at the results of the revolution; and the text of the appeals which Owen Glendower addressed to the King of Scotland and the Irish chiefs.² In spite of the desultory and broken character of the Chronicle, it supplies us also with other little details, which probably came under Usk's personal observation, such as of the mishap at the coronation of Henry IV, of the pageant in London after Agincourt, of a pilgrimage paid to Holywell in Flint by Henry V, of the sale of the booty of Normandy in every quarter of England, and of the dancing and processions in London after the fall of Rouen.³ The Chronicle was finished in May 1421, for it ends with a reference to the impending return of Henry V to France.⁴ But it was not written all at once; some events were recorded as they occurred, others written down long after from memory. Hence the chronology is often at fault, and towards the end there are some careless repetitions.⁵ But with all its imperfections and shortcomings

¹ pp. 65-9. See another copy in Bechington's Correspondence, i. 151.

² pp. 72, 73.

³ pp. 119, 128, 129, 131, 132.

⁴ p. 133.

⁵ Thompson, Preface, p. xxxvi.

as a record, it is a human document which historians cannot afford to disregard.

Adam Usk's Chronicle was unknown till Sir E. M. Thompson edited a portion of it for the Royal Society of Literature in 1876. This portion, which ends abruptly in 1404, was derived from a unique copy in Additional MS. 10104 at the British Museum. Nine years later the missing conclusion came to light amongst the manuscripts of the Duke of Rutland at Belvoir Castle. This fragment had clearly formed part of the same volume as the Additional MS. It is written in several different hands, but the date of writing may be fixed between 1440 and 1450. The complete Chronicle was re-edited by Sir E. M. Thompson in 1904.

Interesting by reason of the fact that it appears, in spite of its brevity, to be independent of all the works previously described is the Northern Chronicle printed below. This appears as part of a so-called 'Kirkstall Chronicle' in Cotton. MS. Domitian A xii, and as a Continuation of Higden's *Polychronicon*¹ in Harley MS. 3600. The latter volume belonged to Whalley Abbey, which, like Kirkstall, was a Cistercian house. So though the title 'Kirkstall Chronicle' is certainly a misnomer, it is probable that this Chronicle was of north-country origin, and possibly written by a monk in one of the Cistercian houses of Yorkshire or Lancashire. Its northern associations are well marked by internal evidence, beginning with the notice of the invasion of Scotland in 1400. Under Henry IV much of the space is occupied with the history of the old Earl of Northumberland, the sieges of Berwick and Alnwick, and Scrope's rebellion. Short though the Chronicle is, it contains some small details of interest, such as the name 'Bullefeld' for the site of the battle of Shrewsbury, the story of Northumberland's imprisonment at Baginton, and the account of how the citizens of York sought pardon from the King.² The history of the reign of Henry V is noteworthy for its account of Oldcastle's rebellion, with the story of how the King was warned of the Lollard rising by a London carpenter.¹ The narrative for the French campaign of 1415 and the sea-fights of 1416 and 1417, if it adds little to our knowledge, has the merit of independence. In the later years the most interesting passage is the list of the knights and nobles who lost their lives in the war. Its northern character is still marked by its references to the Percies and Cliffords,² and to the King's Yorkshire pilgrimage in 1421.³ The Chronicle closes with a brief notice for 1430. The date of writing was therefore at least as late as the autumn of that year. But it was probably founded on Chronicles of an earlier date. There is some internal suggestion for an original which ended with Bramham Moor in 1408; since the Chronicle is most exclusively northern for 1400 to 1408, and there is no history at all from 1408 to 1412. Two passages point to some connexion with other Chronicles. The first is the name 'Bullefeld' for the site of the battle of Shrewsbury. Dr. Wylie found an instance in a document of 1416.⁴ But the only other Chronicles where it occurs are the Waltham Annals,⁵ Gloucester Annals,⁶ and the Chronicon Regum Angliae in Jesus College, Oxford, MS. 29.⁷ It is possible that the use of this name comes from a common original. The account of the King's Yorkshire pilgrimage in 1421 is found only here, in the Vita et Gesta Henrici Quinti of the Pseudo-Elmham,⁸ and in the Chronicle of John Strecche⁹; in this instance the evidence for a common original is very strong.

¹ The 'Kirkstall Chronicle' is itself only an abbreviation of the Polychronicon.

² pp. 281-2; cf. Cont. Eulog. iii. 407, and Wylie, ii. 231.

The Northern Chronicle and Adam Usk's Chronicle have this in common—that they both appear as continuations of the Polychronicon of Ranulph Higden. The Polychronicon was a popular work to which continuations were often appended. It is as such a continuation that the work of the Monk of Evesham most usually appears.¹⁰ Other continuations extending well into the fifteenth century are extant. One which ends in 1425 is found amongst the manuscripts

¹ Confirmed by Cal. Pat. Rolls, i. 157.

² pp. 287, 290 below.

³ p. 290 below.

⁴ Henry IV, i. 360; 'apud bellum de Bolefield in villa de Harlescot.' Inquis. ad quod Damnum 4 Hen. V.

⁵ See p. 350 below.

⁶ See p. 355 below.

⁷ English Historical Review, xxvi. 750.

⁸ pp. 304-7.

⁹ See p. 42 below.

¹⁰ See p. 24 above.

of the Marquis of Bath.¹ Another, which comes down to 1429, is contained in Corpus Christi College MS. 367 at Cambridge.

Except at St. Albans the tradition of keeping regular monastic annals dealing with general history was almost extinct. The few which still struggle on are very meagre. The *Bermondsey Annals*² were regularly kept till 1437, but only six pages belong to our period; the history, such as it is, relates almost entirely to the affairs of the abbey, and the few notices of outside events are of little value. There are some very brief annals which were written at Hickling Priory³ in Norfolk. The *Chronicle of Louth Park Abbey*⁴ has two bald pages for the reign of Henry IV. The Chronicles of Evesham⁵ and Meaux⁶ are concerned only with their own abbeys; the former ends in 1418, and the latter in 1417. The first Continuation of the *Croyland Chronicle*⁷ is a more important work; but it was not written till the reign of Edward IV, and will be more conveniently noticed in a later chapter. A few other instances of monastic annals occur in the middle of the century; where they contain matter for the earlier years it is generally of no value.⁸ Some of these latter were composed as continuations of the Latin Brut; that work relates chiefly to the reigns of Henry IV and Henry V, but was not written till 1437, and it will be best considered in connexion with its English original.⁹ There are various episcopal Chronicles which extend into the fifteenth century¹⁰; but they are of even less value for general history than the contemporary annals kept in monastic houses. They are in the form of short Lives of the bishops, and none of them possess any literary distinction.

So far our attention has been confined to authors who

¹ Hist. MSS. Comm., 3rd Report, p. 183.

² Annales Monastici, iii. 482-7.

³ ap. Oxenedes' Chronicle, pp. 438-9, in Rolls Series.

⁴ Published by the Lincolnshire Record Society in 1891.

⁵ Chronicon Abbatiae Eveshamensis, Rolls Series, 1863.

⁶ Chronicon de Melsa, Rolls Series, 1866-8.

⁷ See pp. 179, 180 below.

⁸ See pp. 154, 158-60 below.

⁹ See pp. 129-31 below; the so-called Godstow Chronicle is only a copy of the Latin Brut, see p. 311 below.

¹⁰ See Wharton, Anglia Sacra, vol. i.

wrote during the reigns of Henry IV and Henry V or not long afterwards. We now come to some works which were composed at a much later date ; but since they relate exclusively to this period it will be best to take them here.

Clement Maidstone's *Historia Martyrii Ricardi Scrope*¹ is a brief tract which is useful for one episode in the reign of Henry IV. Maidstone entered the Priory of the Trinitarian Friars at Hounslow in 1410. He relates that he was living there in 1413, when he heard that as Henry IV was being taken by water for burial at Canterbury there arose a great storm, which ceased when the body of the wicked King was thrown into the Thames. This story, which is supposed to redound to the glory of Archbishop Scrope, is demonstrably false. Though Maidstone professes to write from his own knowledge, he did not set down his narrative till long after the event. The valuable part of it comes from an account compiled by Thomas Gascoigne² about 1433. Gascoigne was then Rector of Kirk Deighton in Yorkshire, and drew much of his material from friends, who spoke from personal knowledge of the facts of Scrope's execution. His story, apart from his readiness to accept the marvellous, is of the highest value. It is printed in Rogers's edition of Gascoigne's *Loci e Libro Veritatum*³ from Bodley MS. Auct. D. 4, 5. Gascoigne died in 1458, and bequeathed his books to the Brigittine monks of Sion at Isleworth. In later life Maidstone had left Hounslow to enter Sion, and it was probably there that he became acquainted in his old age with Gascoigne's story. So, though he writes of events within his own memory, his additions have no value other than that which attaches to the credulous traditions of the next generation.

Another late authority for this period is John Capgrave (d. 1464), an Augustinian friar of Lynn, who included lives of Henry IV and Henry V in his Liber de Illustribus Henricis, which he composed about 1444. The former is a meagre compilation derived for the most part from the Annales Henrici Quarti. Except for a bald reference to Owen Glendower, it contains nothing between the battle of Shrewsbury and the King's death. The only peculiar passages are a character of Henry IV, and his dying address to his son; there is here a general resemblance to the accounts given by Elmham,¹ Hardyng,² John Strecche,³ and the 'Translator of Livius'⁴; they are all probably based on more or less authentic reports current at the time, and need not of necessity have a common origin. The Life of Henry V is merely a prose version of the Liber Metricus of Thomas Elmham.⁵ It is convenient here to notice also Capgrave's English Chronicle of England, which ends abruptly in 1417. It is derived very closely from Walsingham's Historia Anglicana, but with some additions from the Annales Henrici Quarti. There is a little fresh detail on Northumberland's rebellion in 1408, and a notable story of Henry IV's death-bed confession to Friar John Tille, that he could set no remedy for his usurpation, 'for my children will not suffer that the regalie go out of our lineage.'⁶ The Chronicle of England was written shortly before the author's death and dedicated to Edward IV. Both the Liber de Illustribus Henricis and the Chronicle of England were edited somewhat indifferently in the Rolls Series by F. C. Hingeston in 1858. The author's autograph of the former is in Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, MS. 408, and another copy is in Cotton. MS. Tiberius A viii. Of the latter work the manuscripts are both at Cambridge: University Library, Gg iv 12 (the autograph), and Corpus Christi College, 167.

¹ Wharton, Anglia Sacra, ii. 169-72.

² See p. 167 below.

³ pp. 225-32.

I have left to the end, as being still unprinted, a Chronicle which, though little known, is of so much interest that I must describe its contents at some length.

Additional MS. 35295 in the British Museum, for which it was purchased from the Earl of Ashburnham's Library, contains a collection of romances and history put together early in the reign of Henry VI. The compiler was one John Strecche, Canon of Kenilworth, who reveals his name in

¹ ap. Wright, Political Poems, ii. 120; see p. 50 below.

² Chronicle, p. 370, ed. Ellis.

³ See p. 40 below, and First English Life of Henry V, p. xxviii.

⁴ Id. pp. 13-16; see p. 66 below.

⁵ See p. 49 below.

⁶ Chronicle of England, pp. 295, 302.

a note which he inserted in the volume.¹ He does not tell us anything further about himself, though he was probably resident at Kenilworth when the tombs of the founders were discovered in 1416, an event which he celebrated in verse. Several persons of the name occur in contemporary Patent Rolls, but none of them can be connected with Kenilworth or our author. The fourth article in the volume is a Historia Regum Anglie from the earliest times to 1422.² The work is divided into five books; the first three, as shown by the note quoted below, come down to the Norman Conquest; the fourth covers the period from 1066 to 1399, and the fifth is devoted to the reigns of Henry IV and Henry V. The fourth book deals chiefly with the history of the Priory, for which it seems to contain much that is new; the political history, as might be expected, relates commonly to events at Kenilworth, such as the siege in the reign of Henry III and the imprisonment of Edward II; with the reign of Richard II it becomes somewhat fuller.

The fifth book, with which we are here concerned, occupies eighteen leaves or well over a third of the whole work. For the reign of Henry IV the narrative is brief, and though occasionally of interest has little of importance. Two out of seven pages are devoted to the history of the Priory. The most noteworthy things are a character of Henry IV, who is described as 'in musica micans et mirabilis litterature maxime in morali', and a report of his death-bed advice to his son, which resembles the versions given by Elmham and other writers.³

¹ On f. 246^{vo}. 'Explicit liber tercius de Monarchia Regum Anglorum, Saxonum et Dacorum ante conquestum Normannorum. In quibus tribus libris nomen compilatoris huius operis continetur in litteris capitalibus capitulorum dictorum trium librorum immediate precedentium, incipiendo ab Hengesto, qui fuit primus Rex Cantuariorum post aduentum Saxonum in Britanniam. Qui quidem compilator scripsit in hoc volumine de omnibus Regibus Saxsonicis, Danicis et Anglicis ante Monarchiam et post, ex quo Saxones in hac insula regnare ceperunt ab Hengisto vsque ad nobilissimum Henricum Sextum Regem Anglorum inclusiue, filium Regis Henrici quinti et conquestoris optimi.' The capital letters spell Iohannes Strecche Canonicus. The monogram I.S. appears on f. 2^{vo}.

² The Historia Regum Anglie fills ff. 233-79; the fifth book, ff. 262-79. Prefixed on ff. 229-32 is a short history from Brutus to A.D. 827.

³ Strecche's account is quoted ap. The First English Life of Henry V, p. xxxviii. See also pp. 39 above and 50 below.

For the reign of Henry V Strecche's History is full, and of real value in spite of some tincture of untrustworthy gossip and report. The storm at the King's coronation is said to have been worse than any on such an occasion since the days of King Lear. For the Parliament of Leicester in 1414 Henry had a hall built in the middle of the town near the Franciscan Priory ; it was forty yards long and forty feet wide, and was begun and fully finished in twenty-four days. Of Oldcastle's execution there is a peculiar account, with a story of his conversation with John of Bedford foretelling his resurrection, and another of the blindness which befell his misguided followers, who anointed their eyes with his ashes : the place of execution is described as in the Old Field by the unlicensed chapel at Tyburn. The story of the tun of tennis-balls sent to Henry V by the Dauphin is given with some detail ;¹ the addition of cushions for the King to lie on shows that Strecche did not follow the contemporary ballad² but an independent version, which by some chance survived elsewhere to reappear as a new invention in The Famous Victories of Henry V, wherein the French Prince sends 'a carpet and a tunne of tennis-balls' :

Meaning that you are more fit for a Tennis-court

Then a field, and more fitter for a carpet then the camp.
The peculiarity of the version given by Strecche serves to authenticate the story, which as a Canon of Kenilworth he might have heard on the spot.

However, the most valuable passages in Strecche's work relate to the French war. The narrative of the campaign of 1415 is moderately full without being noteworthy. The account of the fighting round Harfleur in 1416 is good ; that of the earlier operations of 1417 and 1418 brief. Then come two stories : one of a narrow escape of Thomas of Clarence from being killed by a cannon-ball at the siege of Bec Hellouin on Easter Day 1418 ; the other of how at the siege of Louviers a French gunner struck the King's tent, and of how after the town had been taken by assault Henry had eight gunners hanged in revenge.³ Of the taking of Pont de l'Arche in

¹ See First English Life of Henry V, p. xliii.

² See p. 239 below.

³ Cf. Holinshed, iii. 99.

July 1418 there is a long description: first of an exploit of Gilbert Umfraville, who constructed a 'Bulewarke', which, says Strecche, 'means in Latin, as I think, opus bellicum'; and secondly of Sir John Cornwall's wager with the Sire de Graville that he would cross the Seine in spite of the French army, which is much fuller than the version given by Monstrelet.¹ A very long history of the siege of Rouen is derived almost entirely from John Page's poem²; but at the end there is added an account of a sortie from the Port Beauvoisin on November 25, 1418. Events down to the taking of Melun in 1420 are then described at fair length with some fresh detail; the credit of the capture of Pontoise is attributed to Clarence, and the help of a traitor, Andrew Lombard; Lombard tried to appropriate the plunder, and was punished by the loss of his promised reward. Of Henry's English progress in 1421 there is a detailed account, describing how he visited his beloved castle of Kenilworth, and his manor of the Pleasant Mareys.³ The itinerary of Henry and Catherine in Yorkshire and on their way south is fuller than those given in the *Northern Chronicle*⁴ and by the Pseudo-Elmham.⁵ The defeat of Clarence at Baugé is changed into a treacherous surprise by Andrew Lombard at Pont de l'Arche; this looks like some early rumour of the disaster in which the truth was concealed; Hardyng,⁶ however, also speaks of the death of Clarence as caused

By counsayll of Andrew, fals Lombarde,
That was his spy betrayed him thederwarde.

In this last story and in some other places Strecche seems to depend on unauthentic rumours and gossip. But though his History is largely made up of picturesque tales which had caught the popular fancy, it is not the less interesting for their novelty. It contains, moreover, some matter of more solid quality, and in this summary of its contents I have not exhausted its value. It is clear that both for details of domestic history and for incidents of the French war, Strecche

¹ Chroniques, iii. 276.

² See pp. 116, 117 below.

³ Cf. Liber Metricus, ap. Memorials of Henry V., pp. 100, 101.

⁴ See p. 290 below.

⁵ Vita Henrici, pp. 300, 304.

⁶ ap. Lansdowne MS. 204, f. 214; it is a detail which does not appear in the printed version. See also Hall, Chronicle, p. 106.

had collected much independent if not always trustworthy information. Except for the siege of Rouen, he does not seem to have made use of any Chronicle now extant, though the itinerary of Henry's English progress in 1421 may come from the same source as those in the Northern Chronicle and the Pseudo-Elmham. Strecche's Latin style is bad; as a literary production his work is worthless, but for its contents it well deserves to be printed in full; I regret that it is too long for inclusion in this volume.

The Chronicles dealt with in this chapter are all of an ordinary mediaeval character. None of them, with the partial exception of Adam Usk's Chronicle, are of any literary merit. None of them get out of the annalistic form, or attempt to give a reasoned history. All, as might be expected, are more or less Lancastrian in tone, though censure of Henry IV for the execution of Archbishop Scrope is common; here, as in their uniform Anti-Lollardism, the ecclesiastical prepossessions of the authors or compilers find expression. All are in the main hostile to the Welsh, though Usk gives us something on the other side. On this subject, and on all that relates to the downfall of Richard II, a corrective may be found in the Anti-English narratives of French historians.¹

To the defects of a narrow outlook, of professional bias, and of lack of literary form must be added the absence of competing schools of historical study. Save at St. Albans, the old tradition of national historiography was nearly extinct. If at St. Albans it retained enough vigour to furnish writers like the Monk of Evesham and Thomas Otterbourne with material for their Chronicles, this was rather due to the decay of learning in other quarters than to the possession of any superlative quality by Walsingham and his collaborators. Nevertheless, the comparatively wide circulation which seems to have been enjoyed by the St. Albans Chronicles is not to be overlooked. With the exception of Usk all other contemporary writers of importance with whom we have so far had to deal were in a greater or less degree indebted to St. Albans—or at least all of them who wrote in Latin.

¹ Cf. Traïson et Mort du Roy Richart (Engl. Hist. Soc.) and Chronique du Religieux de St. Denys.

In the Continuation of the Eulogium and in the Northern Chronicle we may find traces of earlier histories in Latin. But both are meagre, and in their present shape not strictly contemporary. The undoubted original of the former stopped short in 1401; probably it contained little of value which has not been preserved. The existence of an earlier original of the Northern Chronicle rests only on hypothesis; still, enough material of apparently north-country origin is to be found in various quarters to make it probable. What has survived has the merit of independence, but is not sufficient to justify a theory of a northern school of history. Greater interest attaches to the signs of another original, probably written at London and in English, which we can trace in Giles's Chronicle, in the Continuation of the Eulogium, and less certainly in Otterbourne. It is here that we get the germs of a new literary development of history. We shall trace it more fully in the English Chronicles of London and the Brut. Still, it is not without significance that thus early in the fifteenth century Latin writers should have begun to draw their material from English sources. Of the more original writers in Latin we can say no more than that they vary enough and plagiarize enough to show that if an interest in history continued, the writing of it as an art had decayed.

CHAPTER III

THE BIOGRAPHIES OF HENRY V

THREE Lives of Henry V in Latin prose, and one in verse, were written during his lifetime or within thirty years of his death. In the next sixty years one Latin Life, and at least two Lives in English, all in part founded on the earlier Lives, were composed. They all present some points of interest, and between them they illustrate the passage from the mediaeval type, through the work of scholars of the early Renaissance, to a more or less critical biography almost of a modern character.¹

The earliest and, so far as it extends, the most valuable is the Gesta Henrici Quinti, which was first printed by J. A. Giles in 1846, and four years afterwards edited in far better manner by Benjamin Williams for the English Historical Society. Of this Chronicle good use had previously been made by Sir Harris Nicolas in his Battle of Agincourt, where it is described as 'Chronicle A.' or 'The Chaplain's Account', from the fact that it was obviously written by a royal chaplain who had served in the campaign of Agincourt. Williams conjectured on very slender grounds that the author was one Jean Bordin. The true solution was first given in 1874 by Dr. Max Lenz,² who argued that the Gesta is the prose Life which Thomas Elmham, author of the Liber Metricus de Henrico Quinto, stated that he had written.

Thomas Elmham was a monk of St. Augustine's, Canterbury, of which house he wrote a history.³ In 1414 he became prior of the Cluniac monastery of Lenton, in Nottinghamshire. Two letters in Duckett's *Charters and Records of Cluni*⁴ show that in the following year he was one of the King's chaplains

¹ With some of the problems discussed in this chapter I have dealt at more length in the English Historical Review, xxv. 58-92.

² König Sigmund und Heinrich der Fünfte, p. 14.

³ Edited for the Rolls Series by T. Hardwick.

⁴ ii. 15-22.

engaged on his master's business at Westminster. There is no reason to doubt that he made the campaign of Agincourt in the train of Henry V. He seems to have continued in attendance on the King throughout the following year, and from a statement in his *Liber Metricus*¹ appears to have rejoined Henry in Normandy in the early summer of 1418. The *Croyland Chronicle*² mentions the Prior of Lenton as one of those present at the Chapter of the Benedictines at Westminster in 1421, and styles him 'scholaris in Theologia'. Elmham resigned the Priory of Lenton in February 1427, and probably died not long afterwards. Besides the Historia Monasterii Sancti Augustini he composed a chronological work styled Cronica Regum Angliae, to which he prefixed a prologue with initial letters spelling 'Thomas Elmham, Prior Lentonie'.³ In a similar way the first letters of some verses at the end of the Liber Metricus spell 'Thomas Elmham, Monachus'.⁴ In his preface to the Liber Metricus Elmham refers to a prose Life of Henry V which he had written previously.⁵ Hearne, when editing another Vita et Gesta Henrici Quinti, too hastily identified it with this prose Life, and printed it under Elmham's name in 1727.⁶ His error long passed muster, and its general acceptance has confused the whole history of the early biographies of Henry V. But for this false presumption, C. A. Cole, when editing the Liber Metricus, the resemblance of which to the 'Chaplain's Account' is, as he states, patent on every page, must have arrived at the truth, instead of conjecturing that Elmham had borrowed a copy of the Gesta from its author. Out of one hundred and thirty-four chapters of the Liber Metricus, ninety-eight follow, often with close verbal agreement, the narrative of the Gesta. Of the remainder, twenty-eight relate to a period subsequent to the conclusion of the prose Life in 1416; and out of the portion common to the two works only eight are entirely new.

In the preface to the Liber Metricus Elmham described his motives for writing it. His verses, he says, do not contain all

¹ Memorials of Henry V, pp. 163-4.

² Gale, Scriptores, i. 514.

³ Printed by Hearne ap. Elmham, Vita, pp. 377-81.

⁴ Memorials of Henry V, p. 166.

⁵ Id. p. 79.

⁶ See pp. 56-9 below.

that he had described in prose in another work, but put the more important matters in a form easy to be remembered. It was expedient that subjects should be well acquainted with the exploits of their rulers. But the King, who would not permit any songs to be written in his praise, would hardly allow Elmham to discover the bare and notorious truth by diligent inquiry of his nobles. Nevertheless, Elmham assures his readers that they need have no doubt that what was written here in verse was true; 'for the compiler was either an eyewitness of these things, or received a trustworthy account, whether verbal or written, from those who were present.'¹ How just was this claim for the Liber Metricus, and still more for the Gesta, is apparent on an even moderately careful study of the latter work.

The Gesta opens with a brief notice of Henry's coronation, followed by a fairly full account of Oldcastle's trial and insurrection. Oldcastle, says the writer, still skulks from the sight of men in caves;² thus it is clear that the work was written before the capture of the Lollard leader in November 1417. The only other matter for the first two years of the reign consists of a note on Henry's foundations at Sheen, and a summary account of the negotiations with Sigismund and the French. In this part of his History the author probably did not write from his own knowledge. Although he must have been present at Southampton in July 1415, the account of the Scrope and Cambridge plot contains nothing of peculiar importance. But with the sailing of the fleet a fresh note is struck in the description of how 'as we left the shores of the Isle of Wight, swans came swimming amongst our ships'.³ Henceforward the narrative of the campaign of Agincourt is the manifest work of an eyewitness. For the siege of Harfleur, the march to Agincourt, and the battle, it is, taken as a whole, by far the best account which we possess. The long description of the triumphal pageant in London is no doubt based in part on the official programme, but the writer clearly witnessed what he describes. The campaign and the pageant have filled almost exactly one-half of the whole work.⁴

¹ Memorials of Henry V, pp. 79, 80.

³ Id. p. 13.

² Gesta, p. 5.

⁴ Id. pp. 13-68.

The concluding portion contains only the history of another twelvemonth, which it describes in a very unequal fashion. From the pageant of November 1415 the writer passes at once to the Parliament of March 1416, but immediately turns aside to describe the battle of Valmont, though he had given no account of Dorset's previous warfare round Harfleur. Returning to the Parliament he gives a speech made by Henry Beaufort, which is not to be found in the official Roll, and describes at fair length the coming of Sigismund and the beginning of negotiations with the French. Much of this part must have been written from the reports of others, though the author was no doubt in a position to obtain good information. With the departure of the King from London for Southampton in July the personal narrative¹ is resumed, and is marked by the frequent use of we, which continues to Henry's return from Calais in October. The description of the sequence of events which made Henry leave Southampton to rejoin Sigismund and led up to the Treaty of Canterbury is particularly noteworthy, and is fully confirmed by the documentary evidence. The account of Bedford's naval engagement off Harfleur² is probably based on the reports received by the King. That of Warwick's fight with a carrack off Calais³ came almost within the writer's own knowledge. Of interest for the writer's own personality are the record of Henry's directions for services in his chapel,⁴ and two curious acrostic-like verses worthy of the author of the Liber Metricus.⁵ The Gesta closes with an account of the Parliament of October-November 1416.

Three-quarters of the Gesta relates to the two periods, only six months in all, when the writer was in attendance on the King. Naturally these are the most valuable portions. But much of the rest is clearly based on good information. The writer had access to official records. He refers several times to documents as preserved in the 'Liber evidentiarius regaliū et recordorū'.⁶ In other places he is of interest for the frankness with which he repeats popular opinions, such as the

¹ Gesta, pp. 82-105.

² Id. p. 97.

³ Id. p. 93.

⁴ Id. pp. 85-9.

⁵ Id. pp. 90, 91.

⁶ Id. pp. 8, 10, 77, 82.

talk in the army on the way to Agincourt,¹ and the common rumour about the causes of the failure of the negotiations at Calais in 1416.² In its style and outlook the Gesta is thoroughly mediaeval; but it displays the mediaeval historian at his best. The narrative is straightforward and graphic. At times it shows a simple eloquence, as in describing how 'we turned our steps along the river, thinking that we must march full sixty miles into the heart of France, till when our eight days' store of food was spent, our little band, grown weak and weary with long marches and short rations, should fall a prey to the great host of the enemy';³ or in the tale of how at Agincourt the priests sat upon their horses amid the baggage in the rear, and humbled themselves in prayer.⁴ On the other hand, when he comes to describe the storm in which Henry crossed over from Calais in October 1416,⁵ the author gives way to the temptation of fine writing, and loses himself in a tumult of long words. The work is an authentic original, and in it Elmham was certainly under no debt to any of his contemporaries. It seems, however, to have been little known; the only evidence of its use in the fifteenth century is contained in a brief Latin account of the Agincourt campaign, which Hardyng incorporated in the second version of his Chronicle.⁶ Stow and Holinshed were both unacquainted with the Gesta. Of later historians Sir Harris Nicolas was the first to make use of it. There are only two manuscripts—Cotton. Julius E iv, ff. 113-27, which was presented to Sir Robert Cotton by Patrick Young (d. 1652), the biblical scholar; and Sloane 1776;⁷ both are at the British Museum. Williams collated both manuscripts for his edition; Giles was dependent on a transcript of the second alone.

There is not much to be said of Elmham's Liber Metricus: its uncouth versification makes it obscure, not easy. The chief addition in the first part is for Henry's visit to Kenilworth, his construction of 'Le Plaisant Mareys', and the sending of the tennis-balls;⁸ the resemblance to Strecche's narrative is probably accidental. There are a few other small details, and notices of the deaths of bishops, which do not appear in the Gesta.¹ The concluding chapters are of some value for the Lollard movement of 1417, and especially for the circumstance of the capture of Oldcastle. Capgrave's Life of Henry V in his *De Illustribus Henricis*² is merely a prose version of the Liber Metricus. Two memorial verses on Harfleur and Agincourt appear also in many other places; they were clearly common property.³ The Liber Metricus was consulted by Stow, but apparently not by Holinshed.

¹ Gesta, p. 38.² Id. p. 103.³ Id. pp. 39, 40.⁴ Id. pp. 51, 53.⁵ Id. p. 105.⁶ Hardyng, Chronicle, p. 389, ed. Ellis. See p. 146 below.⁷ See further, p. 63 below.⁸ ll. 145-62.

Elmham states that it was his intention to describe the reign of Henry V in lustres. This explains why the Liber Metricus stops short in 1418. Why Elmham never continued his work we cannot say. It is a matter for regret that if, as seems likely, he went again to France in 1418, he should have left us no record of the siege of Rouen and the subsequent campaigns.

Some didactic verses, addressed by Elmham to Henry V on the occasion of his father's death and his own accession are printed in Wright's Political Poems.⁴ They have no historical value except in so far as they appear to preserve the current report of the dying advice of Henry IV to his son, as given also by John Hardyng,⁵ by Stretche, and by the 'Translator of Livius'.⁶

Elmham's Cronica Regum in Cotton. MS. Claudius E iv is no more than an extensive chronological table with a few annalistic notes, ending in 1388.⁷ The Prologue was printed by Hearne in his edition of the Vita by the Pseudo-Elmham.⁸

In the Vita Henrici Quinti by Titus Livius, which was published by Hearne in 1716, we come to a work of a very

¹ ll. 139-44, 163-4, 173-83, 535-8, 575-80, 693-700, 757-60.

² pp. 112-24; cf. Memorials of Henry V, pp. liv-lvii.

³ ll. 579-80:

Harfieu fert Mauric. Agincort praelia Crispin :

His Regis nostri tertius annus erat.

See Usk, p. 129; Bermondsey Annals, ap. Ann. Mon. iii. 484; Brut, p. 598. John Stretche also gives them.

⁴ ii. 118-23.

⁵ Chronicle, p. 370, ed. Ellis.

⁶ First English Life of Henry V, pp. 13-16.

⁷ See Engl. Hist. Rev. xxv, p. 62; it gives the date of birth for Henry V as September 16, 1387, and for his brother Thomas as September 30, 1388.

⁸ pp. 377-81.

different character. Titus Livius Forojuliensis, as he is styled on Hearne's title-page, appears in the official record of his denization in England on March 7, 1437,¹ as 'Titus Livius de Frulovisiis de Ferrara', and is better described as Tito Livio da Forli. He was a native of Forli, about forty miles from Ferrara. The date of his birth was probably some years later than 1400, since he tells us that from his earliest years he had heard his father talk of Henry V as the most famous Prince of the age.² Hence when Tito Livio refers to Emanuel Chrysoloras as 'preceptor noster',³ he must not be taken literally. But his further statement that he had received instruction from Guarini of Verona is probable enough;⁴ for that famous scholar settled at Ferrara in 1431, though he did not begin to teach publicly till 1436. Tito Livio's acquaintance with Guarini may, however, belong to a later period. At all events it cannot have been later than 1436 that he left Italy to take service in England with Humphrey of Gloucester, who made him his 'poet and orator'.⁵ At a time when he was about to return to his native country Humphrey entrusted him with the task of writing a Life of Henry V.⁶ The dedication of his work shows that before its completion he had already been 'indigenated' in England. The date of writing was therefore later than March 1437. In an *Encomium*⁷ of sixty-three hexameter lines addressed to John Stafford, then Bishop of Bath, Tito declared that he had been anxious to sing the praise of Britain; but as Britons were poor and he was entangled with debt, he must go home to Italy. Since Stafford was translated to Canterbury in 1443 the Encomium must in any case have been written before that date. As a matter of fact it must have been in 1438 or 1439 that Tito Livio left England. After a visit to Milan, he went to Toulouse, where he stayed long enough to graduate as doctor. From Toulouse he journeyed to Barcelona, whence, apparently

¹ Foedera, x. 661.

² Vita Henrici Quinti, p. 1.

³ He speaks of his knowledge of Greek as learnt 'ex doctissimo et in primis humanissimo preceptore nostro Emanuele Chrysolora.' De Orthographia, pt. iii, Prologus.

⁴ Id. cap. xli 'de quibus certior factus fui a Guarino Veronensi Emanuelis Chrysolorae discipulo.

⁵ Foedera, x. 661.

⁶ Vita, p. 2.

⁷ ap. Cotton. MS. Claudius E iii, f. 353^{vo}.

in 1440, he wrote to his friend the Milanese humanist, Pier Candido Decembri, describing his adventures since leaving Milan, and sending him a copy of the Vita Henrici. Decembri much later, in 1462, made an Italian translation of his friend's History, and dedicated it to Francesco Sforza in 1463.¹ Some extracts from this translation, a copy of which is preserved at Vienna, were published by Dr. Wylie in the English Historical Review for January 1909. Together with the copy of the Vita in Arundel MS. 12 at the College of Arms, which is illuminated with the armorial bearings of Humphrey of Gloucester, they fully authenticate the printed Life as the genuine work of Tito Livio. Of Tito's later career we know no more. But he clearly enjoyed a good reputation in his own country. Towards the end of the fifteenth century there appeared under his name a Liber de Ortographia,² in which he is described as a famous orator and poet and praised for his services to the cause of sound Latinity. It is from this work that we learn of Tito's association with Guarini. The fact that it shows us the author of the Vita Henrici as a zealous supporter of the new learning is not without importance as illustrating the growth of culture and development of historical literature in England.

It is clear that Tito Livio's Vita was written after March 1437, and probably not later than 1438, since Tito must have been absent from England some considerable time when he wrote to Decembri from Barcelona. The Life is short,

¹ Archivio Storico Lombardo, ser. ii (Anno xx), vol. x, pp. 63, 428.

² Titi Liuii de Frulovisiis ferrariensis, Oratoris ac Poete celeberrimi, de Ortographia Liber admodum singularis pro sua precellentia non minus magistris quam scholaribus vtilissimus feliciter Incipit.

Anthonii liberi Susatensis epigramma in laudem Autoris :

Qui cupit errantem linguam renouare Latinam,
Bonosque libros scriptaque prisca sequi,
Barbarico Liuium pulso sermone sequatur,
Cuius habet veram hec Ortographia fidem.

The book contains seventy-six unnumbered leaves, without date or place, or name of printer. In the British Museum Catalogue it is assigned to 1488. The colophon substantially repeats the title. The author describes his subject as 'recta scriptura quam recta appellatione Ortographiam dicimus'. As an essential part of an orator's office he thinks it useful to bring together what he has found in ancient commentaries. In the first part he gives general rules for composition and spelling. The second part deals with 'singulae dictiones', giving lists of words with derivations in alphabetical order. The third part is 'De dipthongandis'.

considerably shorter than the Gesta, though it deals with nearly double the period. It is well written, and justifies Holinshed's description of it as in 'a good, familiar, and easy stile'.¹ Avowedly composed at the suggestion of Humphrey of Gloucester at a time when the war was the burning question of English politics, it is naturally martial in tone and favourable to the author's patron and his policy. For his material Tito states expressly² that Humphrey supplied him with all the monuments of his hero's exploits that could be found. Part of his information was no doubt obtained from Humphrey himself and his associates. The statement is, however, obviously intended to cover written sources, and one such source we are able to identify with certainty. This is a Latin version of the Brut composed in 1436 or 1437, which the Italian scholar followed where it served his purpose, with no more alteration than is involved in an occasional embellishment of its phraseology.³ The chief material which Tito Livio derived from this source relates to events in England previous to the commencement of the French war in 1415, the conclusion of the campaign of Agincourt, the naval war of 1416, the negotiations with Sigismund, the main narrative of the negotiations in France in 1419-20 (other than the actual terms of the Treaty of Troyes), and some scattered fragments for the last two years of the reign.⁴ The whole of this material forms a little less than a fifth of the Vita. It is perhaps natural that an Italian should have used the Brut through the medium of a Latin translation. But there are some passages which point to familiarity with the English original; such are the notice of the expedition of 1411, the triumphal return from Agincourt, the coming of Sigismund, Bedford's naval engagement, some details for the siege of Rouen, and possibly something for the capture of Pontoise and Clarence's reconnoitring of Paris.⁵

¹ Chronicles, iii. 136.

² Livius, p. 2.

³ See the original on pp. 323-37 below. For the date of this Chronicle see p. 130.

⁴ Vita, pp. 5-7, 20-1, 23, 24-5, 26-7, 71-2, 75, 78, 81-2, 83-5, 88, 90, 92, 93; see more fully the footnotes on pp. 323-37 below.

⁵ Id. pp. 4-5, 21-3, 23-4, 25-6, 61, 65, 75-7; compare Brut, pp. 371, 380-1, 388-90, 424.

The list of Sigismund's company in 1416 shows obvious signs of being derived from the same source as one in the Cleopatra Chronicle of London.¹ It is clear also that Tito Livio had access to official documents; as for the numbers of the host in 1417, the Treaties of Canterbury and Troyes, and Henry's letter to Amiens in 1422.² In two places Tito Livio refers definitely to other written sources without any precise indication; one relates to the legislation at Leicester in 1414,³ and the other to Henry's ordinances for his troops at Troyes.⁴ We have left as more or less original in its contents less than three-fourths of the Vita, the greater part of which is descriptive of the actual warfare in France; the only noteworthy exceptions are the story of Olandyne,⁵ the conference at Melun,⁶ Henry's stay at Paris in 1420,⁷ and the story of his last days.⁸ In the military narrative the two chief passages deal with the campaign of Agincourt,⁹ and the second expedition from August 1417 to May 1419.¹⁰ These two passages take nearly half the whole work. Shorter passages treat of the capture of Pontoise, and the sieges of Gisors, Montereau, and Melun.¹¹ The campaign of 1421 and the important siege of Meaux are dismissed in two pages.¹² It is noteworthy that Humphrey of Gloucester returned to England in December 1419. Thus the full military narrative is confined to those campaigns in which the Duke had taken part. It does not seem too much to assume that the meagre account of subsequent events is due to the fact that Tito Livio's main source of information here failed him. The conjecture that the author was indebted mainly to his patron for his history of the war is supported by the prominence given to Humphrey's own exploits, above all in the long account of the campaign in the Cotentin and the siege of Cherbourg.¹³ The circumstance that Tito Livio's Vita dwells so much on the war and so little on events in England is probably to be explained by the fact that he wrote

¹ Vita, p. 23; Chronicles of London, p. 124.

² Vita, pp. 27-8, 31-2, 84-8, 94.

³ Id. p. 7.

⁴ Id. p. 83.

⁵ Id. p. 7.

⁶ Id. pp. 74-5.

⁷ Id. pp. 90, 91.

⁸ Id. pp. 94, 95.

⁹ Id. pp. 8-20.

¹⁰ Id. pp. 33-72.

¹¹ Id. pp. 75-7, 78, 89, 90.

¹² Id. pp. 92, 93.

¹³ Id. pp. 50-6; for other notices in Humphrey's honour see pp. 20, 41, 42, 64, 72, 79.

in his patron's interest at a time when Duke Humphrey, as the leader of the war party after the breach with Burgundy, was naturally anxious to magnify English exploits and especially those in which he had himself taken part.

Humphrey may have furnished material for the speeches which Tito Livio puts into Henry's mouth. These have usually a brevity and directness which accord well with the habit of a Prince who spoke but little and that to the point; though Henry's reply to Sir Walter Hungerford before Agincourt is inferior to the version given in the Gesta.¹ But in many instances the speeches may preserve some reminiscence of what Henry really said.

A weak point in Tito Livio's History is chronology. English events and the course of negotiations with France in 1414-15 are confused through a too slavish following of the Latin Brut.² But Tito Livio's own dates in 1418 to 1420 are frequently at fault as to the exact day;³ however, some of these errors do not appear in the best manuscript.

Though Tito Livio could write nothing from his own knowledge, it is clear that he had access to trustworthy and authentic material. Of our English sources his Life ranks next in value to the Gesta, and after that work fails us, is on the whole for 1417 to 1420 the best. It may be described as the official biography of Henry V. As such it became the chief source of the narratives of later writers, and firstly of the Pseudo-Elmham about 1446. At a later time Polydore Vergil used it, either directly or through the medium of the Pseudo-Elmham. Edward Hall seems to have had no knowledge of it; but Stow and Holinshed knew it well, though the former depended almost entirely, and the latter in great part, on the English version of the 'Translator'. Through the medium of Stow and Holinshed Tito Livio's Vita contributed the principal historical basis to the popular conception of its hero. Thomas Goodwin, whose History of the Reign of Henry V appeared in 1704, had only a second-hand knowledge of Tito Livio's Vita. Hearne's text of 1716 was based on Cotton. MS. Claudius E iii, collated with Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, MS. 285, which Hearne cites as 'Ben'; the readings of the latter are often preferable. The Latin original of the 'Translator', and therefore also that of Stow, closely resembled the Cambridge manuscript. Other manuscripts are Arundel 12 at the College of Arms,¹ and Corpus Christi College, Cambridge, 112; the former is a contemporary, the latter a sixteenth-century copy.

¹ Vita, pp. 16-17; cf. Gesta, p. 47. ² Vita, pp. 6, 7; cf. pp. 323-4 below.

³ Vita, pp. 57-60, 78-80.

Within a few years after its composition Tito Livio's Vita was taken in hand by another writer, who announced that it was his purpose to turn the bald draft of formless matter into a shapely picture.² This Life is the one which Hearne published in 1727 as 'Thomae de Elmham, Vita et Gesta Henrici Quinti'. For his attribution of it to Elmham, Hearne had no better ground to go upon than the conjectural ascription in Smith's Catalogue of the Cottonian MSS. of a copy of the work in Julius E iv to Elmham. But in the original manuscript the Cotton copy is anonymous, as also are the other copies in Harley 864 at the British Museum, Arundel 15 at the College of Arms, and All Souls College 38 at Oxford.³ The first three manuscripts all date from about the middle of the fifteenth century; the last, which is imperfect,⁴ is an early sixteenth-century copy. Hearne gave an air of authority to his conjecture by a number of citations from earlier writers—such as Pits, Francis Thynne, and Wharton—who had made reference to Elmham, but not as author of the Vita.⁵ Nor do Hearne's quotations from Elmham's Liber Metricus and Cronica Regum serve in any way to connect him with the Vita, which, seeing that it has so long passed under his name, we may for convenience refer to as the Pseudo-Elmham. That this completed 'Life' could not be the one to which Elmham alludes in his Liber Metricus is manifest from the fact that the latter work was an incomplete 'Life', written whilst Henry V was still alive and before the composition of the Liber Metricus in 1418.⁶

¹ See p. 52 above.

² Vita et Gesta, pp. 2, 3 'tabulam nudam informis materiae in conformem, prudentia peritorum pictorum, in medium deducere picturandam.'

³ A fifth manuscript is 'Latin' 6240, in the Bibliothèque Nationale at Paris.

⁴ It stops abruptly at 'ministeriis, tam nobiles quam alii erunt' on p. 264 of the printed text.

⁵ Hearne, Preface, pp. xiv, xv; cf. Engl. Hist. Rev. xxv. 62.

⁶ See pp. 46, 47 above.

Moreover, the Life by the Pseudo-Elmham, apart from those portions which are related closely to Tito Livio's Vita, contains internal evidence that it was written long after Henry's death. In one of the early chapters Henry's foundations at Sheen are referred to as of long standing: 'earum condiciones . . . vera experientia usque hodie manifestat.'¹ In a later passage (which also corresponds with nothing in Livio's Vita) a disparaging allusion to Philip of Burgundy and the insertion of a story reflecting on the good faith of his subjects suggest that the Pseudo-Elmham wrote after the breach between England and Burgundy in 1435.² It might of course be contended that Tito Livio was the later writer, and borrowed from the Life by the Pseudo-Elmham. So long as it was supposed that the latter was the true work of Thomas Elmham, this seemed a natural hypothesis. But for the last three years of the reign the history given by the Pseudo-Elmham is much the superior, and comes obviously from another source. It is most unlikely that Tito Livio should have had it before him, and been content to substitute for it his own brief and inferior narrative.

However, the Pseudo-Elmham himself supplies us with more conclusive evidence. His last chapter is an address to John Somerset, whom he describes as one who had informed the King's person with health, and his mind with understanding, the servant of the state and the proctor of the poor, who had lately established a chapel of royal foundation in honour of St. Raphael, St. Gabriel, St. Michael, and all the Holy Angels of God.³ Somerset was a Cambridge scholar and Fellow of Pembroke College who was appointed physician to Henry VI in 1427, and was employed in teaching him and preserving his health.⁴ Afterwards, in 1434, he was made Chancellor of the Exchequer and warden of the King's exchange in the Tower; he resigned the latter office in 1447, but held the former till he was dismissed on the petition of the Commons in 1451.⁵ In 1443 he was appointed lieutenant of the manor of Sheen,⁶ a post which led to the foundation by

¹ Pseudo-Elmham, p. 25.

² Id. pp. 281-4.

³ Id. pp. 338-42.

⁴ Id. p. 348; Cal. Pat. Rolls, Henry VI, i. 460, ii. 241.

⁵ Cal. Pat. Rolls, iii. 418; Rolls of Parlt., v. 216.

⁶ Cal. Pat. Rolls, iv. 82.

him, as parcel of the royal monastery of Sion, of a chapel and guild in honour of the Nine Orders of the Holy Angels. For this foundation, which included an almshouse for nine poor men, he obtained letters patent on October 12, 1446.¹ Somerset was himself a man of learning, and as one of the executors of Humphrey of Gloucester was appealed to, not very successfully, for his help in securing the Duke's books for Oxford. However, he made a present of some of his own, and the University, in thanking him for his liberality, complimented him because whilst busy with the affairs of state he could find time for letters and learning.²

Somerset's history thus fixes the latter part of 1446 as the earliest possible date for the concluding chapter of the 'Life' by the Pseudo-Elmham. The main text of the work is not likely to have been written much earlier. Nor is it very likely, in view of the prominent position given to Humphrey of Gloucester, to have been written after the death of the Duke in February 1447. More absolute evidence of the latest date is afforded by the preface in the All Souls MS.,³ which is addressed to Walter, Lord Hungerford, who died on August 9, 1449. The address to Somerset at the end is of course missing in the imperfect All Souls MS.; it is possible that it may have been added to a second edition at the same time as the change in the dedication; but even so it must have been written before Somerset's dismissal in 1451.

Who the author of the Vita of the Pseudo-Elmham really

¹ Cal. Pat. Rolls, v. 29; see further Engl. Hist. Rev. xxv. 68, 69.

² Anstey, Epistolae Academicae (Oxford Hist. Soc.), pp. 258, 286, 309.

³ In the other MSS. the preface is addressed to the reader. The All Souls preface agrees nearly with the printed text till the fifth line on p. 3, when it proceeds thus: 'Gregoriani eciam pectinis angelici melodia inertis cithe-redi dellris tractibus et concentibus inconsonis sese exhibere precauet pertractandam. Quis, quae, extra fores retorice positus peregrinus et aduena tantam perfecte posset polire paginam, aut ab angusti pectoris exsiccatu fonticulo tam spaciosam deriuare valeret abissum? Prudencie igitur tue, illustris domine et miles nobilis, Waltere, Domine de Hungreford, qui, qualiter prefatum Principem in tue dileccionis amplexatus es brachiis post mortem, ostendere argumentis minimis [sic MS.] non desistis, huius paruitatem opusculi, quod eciam tuis allectiuis iussionibus me fecisti ingredi, recomendo, quatenus istud cuicumque viro prudenti tua discrecio decreuerit offeras corrigendum, qui, eciam mee humilime supplicacionis instancia correccionis limas apponendo, impolita poliendo, et dissuta consuendo, hoc idem adhuc sese in publicum deulare non audens deducat tucius in apertum.'

was remains an unsolved problem. In his preface he speaks of himself as 'extra fores rhetoricae positus peregrinus et aduena'. This may be no more than a flourish intended with mock modesty to excuse his own want of capacity. The form of the words in the All Souls MS. favours this interpretation.¹ It has, however, been conjectured on the strength of this expression that the writer was a foreigner,² and such a conjecture may be plausibly supported for other reasons. The author was obviously proud of his literary craftsmanship, and set out to write on classical models, a purpose which he thought to achieve by verbose rhetoric and by sprinkling his text freely with mythological allusions: Henry is the soldier both of Mars and of Venus; Ceres and Bacchus flee in terror from Rouen; Eolus swells the sails; the eastern side of a town is the one which looks towards the rising of the star of Phebus; and so forth. All this points to the author as one who had been caught by the new learning, of which Humphrey of Gloucester was the patron in England. It is possible that, like Tito Livio, he was one of the foreign scholars whom Humphrey attached to his service. Such a theory is consistent with his friendship for Somerset, who was familiar with the Duke and himself a friend of learning. It does not fit so well with the statement that he wrote at the request of Lord Hungerford,³ who in his later life was a political opponent of the Duke.

Hearne's blunder in attributing this 'Life' to Elmham has been the cause of so much error and confusion that it was necessary to deal with it in detail. We may now turn to a more fruitful topic in the 'Life' itself. The Vita of the Pseudo-Elmham is to be divided into two sections. The first consists of chapters i-xci, and resembles very closely the work of Tito Livio; the second, chapters xcii-cxxix, is derived for the most part from other sources. In the first section, chapters x-xii, which describe at length the ceremonies connected with the coronation of Henry V, are almost entirely new; Livio simply records the fact of the coronation 'with all solemnity and pomp'. Otherwise in this section the additions of the Pseudo-Elmham are little more noteworthy than his omissions. It is chiefly by mere empty rhetoric that he more than doubles in bulk the narrative of his predecessor. For the most part the additions are names which Livio had not specified: as of Monmouth for Henry's birthplace; of the hulk, the Mountnegrie, which was sunk at Harfleur in 1416; of Baawmore as the place where the Scots were defeated in 1417.¹ Of more importance are details of the muster at Southampton in 1415, of the siege of Harfleur, and in particular of Clarence's share in it.² The inaccurate dates often receive correction; as for instance those for the surrenders of the castle of Falaise and of Cherbourg,³ and a whole series in chapters lxii and lxiii. A considerable space is occupied by long-winded speeches attributed to Henry V; they are manifestly less authentic than those given by Livio. The first section closes with a marked difference in the account of the negotiations at Troyes in 1420, where the Pseudo-Elmham omits the text of the oaths taken by Charles of France and Philip of Burgundy, but gives the terms of the treaty much more fully; in this it is possible that he was guided by the example of Monstrelet.

¹ The printed text differs in being more personal to the writer: 'Non enim valeo extra fores rhetoricae positus peregrinus positus et advena.'

² James Tyrrell ap. Arundel MS. 15: 'per Authorem anonymum sed Peregrinum;' cf. Hearne, p. xvii.

³ See note on p. 58 above.

The chief omissions made by the Pseudo-Elmham from Tito Livio's narrative are the statement that Henry consulted the Universities on his right in France; the story of the Sire de Helly; the details of the visit of Sigismund in 1416, and the composition of the army in 1417.⁴ A notable variation relates to the death of John of Burgundy, of whom Livio, quoting the Latin Brut,⁵ writes 'spoliatus et nudus in puteum deiectus est'; for this the Pseudo-Elmham has 'nec tunica nec ocreis spoliatum', which seems to be a translation of 'reservé son pourpoint et ses houseaux' of Monstrelet.⁶

In the second section of the Vita of the Pseudo-Elmham (chapters xcii-cxxix) the relation to the work of Tito Livio is

¹ pp. 4, 81, 163.

² pp. 137, 162; cf. Livius, pp. 49, 56.

³ See Livius, pp. 6, 18, 23, 27-9.

⁴ pp. 35, 41.

⁵ See p. 334 below.

⁶ Livius, p. 78; Pseudo-Elmham, p. 236, cf. p. 272; Monstrelet, iii. 347, 404; the Brut, p. 561, has 'put into a pit, botit and spurret'.

very different. Instead of being somewhat more than twice as long, it is now nearly tenfold longer. Even when the two go over the same ground they here seem to be independent. In spite of his brevity, Tito Livio gives a few details which do not appear in the other author: thus he describes the fate of Barbasan and his release from captivity, ten years afterwards; mentions the departure of Philip of Burgundy from Paris in 1420; has a peculiar notice of the birth of Henry VI, and records the Duke of Brittany's assent to the Treaty of Troyes in 1422.¹ But apart from these details the narrative of the last two years of the reign of Henry V as given by the Pseudo-Elmham is altogether superior to that of his predecessor. For the sieges of Melun and Meaux, for Henry's visit to England, for his Progress in the Midlands and in Yorkshire, and for the story of his last days it is of exceptional interest and value.

As regards the sources used by the Pseudo-Elmham for his additions to, and corrections of Tito Livio's Vita, some of the details in the first section, such as the name of the Mount-negrie, may have come from the English Brut. The corrections of dates might have been taken from official documents, like the appointments for the surrender of towns, which were such common property that they are quoted in various London Chronicles.² On other matters the Pseudo-Elmham's turgid rhetoric makes it difficult to trace his sources. For the siege of Harfleur he seems to have had a different and independent source. In the second section he had, as noted before, probably made some use of Monstrelet. The accounts of the siege of Meaux, and of the last days of Henry V, may very possibly be derived from the information of Walter Hungerford, who was present on both occasions. But probably the author had access to a lost English source, as well for the French war as for events in England. Strecche's *Historia*³ shows us that narratives of the war, which differed materially from the printed ones now extant, were current in the fifteenth century. Both in Strecche and in the *Northern Chronicle*⁴ we find notices of Henry's English Progress in 1421 analogous to

¹ Livius, pp. 90, 91, 95.

³ See pp. 41, 42 above.

² See p. 82 below.

⁴ See p. 200 below.

that given by the Pseudo-Elmham; they may all have come from some common source now lost or untraced.

The Pseudo-Elmham's Vita is referred to by Archbishop Parker in the preface to his edition of Walsingham, where he censures Tito Livio for not having made better use of this anonymous writer. Stow¹ quotes the Pseudo-Elmham occasionally under the name of Roger Wall, who was Archdeacon of Coventry from 1442 till his death in 1488, and writer of the copy in Arundel MS. 15, in which his name and rebus appear; ² this manuscript in Stow's time belonged to his acquaintance Lord William Howard. Holinshed made more copious use of the Pseudo-Elmham in his Chronicle,³ where the work is referred to as by an anonymous author, who changed the good, familiar, and easy style which Livio used into a certain poetical kind of writing. Hearne's edition in 1727 was based on a collation of Arundel 15 and Harley 864.⁴

In the Lives of Henry V composed by Tito Livio and the Pseudo-Elmham we have a marked stage in the development of historical writing in England. Though widely different in literary merit, both writers were avowedly under the influence of the Renaissance, and departing from the monastic tradition wrote upon classical models. Apart from the circumstance that they wrote in Latin, it is obvious that they wrote for a more or less cultured circle. They probably were not in their original dress very widely read; but they were works of repute, and both were within the next two generations translated into English. In consequence Tito Livio at all events has had a lasting influence on the common store of our English histories.

Within a very few years the Vita of the Pseudo-Elmham appeared in an abbreviated Latin version, in which it was rid of most of its verbiage. This version is preserved in a mutilated form⁵ in Royal MS. 13, C i, of which I spoke in the last chapter in connexion with Giles's Chronicle of Henry IV.

¹ Annales, pp. 345, 347, 360.

² See Eng. Hist. Rev. xxv. 63, 89.

³ iii. 136.

⁴ On the other MSS. see p. 56 above. Harley 864 may perhaps be the author's autograph; see Engl. Hist. Rev. xxv. 69 n.

⁵ It begins 'concussis vires suas alterutrum multa strenuitate', corresponding with p. 41 of the Pseudo-Elmham.

The volume contains Chronicles of the reigns of Richard II, Henry IV, Henry V, and Henry VI. That for Henry V is in a different hand to the other three, and is probably somewhat older. The Chronicle for Henry VI was written after 1457, since it refers to the death of Eleanor Cobham. The abbreviation of the Pseudo-Elmhams may therefore be dated about 1455. The Chronicles as given in the Royal MS. are probably the sources of the continuous Chronicle in Sloane MS. 1776. But in this latter manuscript the reign of Henry V is given differently. Down to 1416 the Gesta, or work of the true Elmham, is followed, and the abbreviation of the Pseudo-Elmham is used only as a continuation for the later years. As such the abbreviation of the Pseudo-Elmham has been in part printed by Williams in his edition of the Gesta. Giles, who depended only on transcripts, has misrepresented the character of the manuscripts for the reign of Henry V in his preface, and printed only the text of the Gesta. Williams correctly described the continuation as 'little more than an abridgement of Elmham', but added: 'In one instance (p. 131) the author adopts the statement of Livius in his very words, and in other places he has added the names of the barons and knights present at the principal sieges.'¹ This is inaccurate. In the instance cited the author adopts 'the very words' not of Livius, but of the Pseudo-Elmham, whilst for 'other places' I can find only the single case of Melun; the list there given resembles one in the Latin Brut.² The author of the abridgement follows the Pseudo-Elmham with extraordinary verbal fidelity, only departing slightly from his original when through his omissions something is required to restore the sequence of the sense. Consequently his work has no independent value except for the addition of a few small details, as on the Scottish invasion of 1417, and on the death of Sir John Cornwall's son at Meaux.³

Probably much about the same time as the compilation of the abridgement in the Royal and Sloane MSS. another writer made an abridgement in English of the work of the Pseudo-Elmham. This English abridgement is preserved only in some mutilated fragments of a sixteenth-century transcript amongst the Collections of John Stow in Harley MS. 530. I described its contents in the *English Historical Review*¹ for January 1910. The narrative is much curtailed, and adds nothing to the Latin original. It has therefore only a literary interest, as illustrating the development of historical writing and the passage from Latin to English as the popular medium. It is worth noting that the Pseudo-Elmham's long description of Duke Humphrey's campaign in the Cotentin and siege of Cherbourg is omitted altogether.

¹ Gesta, p. viii.

² See p. 319 below.

³ Gesta, pp. 121, 155.

Another Life of Henry V, which also seems to have been written in English soon after 1455, and was of far greater interest, has unfortunately survived only in some second-hand fragments. In Holinshed's Chronicles,² mention is made of an English translation of Tito Livio's Vita, 'adding sundry things for the more large understanding of the history.' In two places Holinshed quotes the 'Translator of Livius' specifically as his authority. Before him Nicholas Harpsfield in his Historia Anglicana, and Stow in the editions of his Summary of the Chronicles of England, published in 1570 and 1575, had referred to the 'Translator of Livius', and alleged that his additions were taken from the information of the Earl of Ormonde.

The long-lost work of the 'Translator of Livius' came recently to light in Bodley MS. 966, which was written about 1610; another copy in Harley MS. 35 at the British Museum is of a little later date. I edited it in 1911 as The First English Life of Henry V.³ It is not quite accurate to describe it as a translation of Livius. It is in fact a compilation made, not without some faculty of critical selection, from a variety of sources. The writer in his proem explains that he had translated 'two books, the one of Titus Livius out of facund Latin, the other of Enguerrant Monstrelet out of the common language of France', adding divers sayings of the English Chronicles (i.e. the Brut), and also divers opinions that he had heard of the report of the Earl of Ormonde. The date of composition can be fixed precisely to the autumn of 1513 by a reference to the French campaign of Henry VIII in that year. The work has therefore no historical importance of its own except as an early compilation from other sources. But the passages which it has preserved from the information of the Earl of Ormonde are of great interest. They include three out of four statements attributed specifically by later writers to the 'Translator', the fourth being only a trivial allusion, and also four other stories, for which Stow and Holinshed had not given their authority, together with two that are entirely new. The majority of them may be described as relating to the legend of Henry V, the origin of which they thus carry back to the middle of the fifteenth century, when they were told on the authority of a man who had served in the Court and wars of Henry V. The Earl of Ormonde is obviously James Butler, the fourth Earl, who took part in the French expedition of 1412, was present at Agincourt and in the subsequent campaigns of 1418 and 1419, and died in 1452. The 'Translator' states in his proem that he adds opinions 'that I have read of the report of a certain honourable and ancient person'; in his text he writes of what 'I have heard of the credible report of my said lord and master, the Earl of Ormonde'.¹ From the form of the latter allusion it must be accepted that he gives the ipsissima verba of his original. We may therefore be satisfied that the stories have come down to us substantially in the form in which they were told by Ormonde himself. The original cannot have been written by Ormonde, since it was not finished till after 1455. Probably it was compiled from his material by an author in his service. It may have taken the form of a Life of Henry V, or possibly was a work of a more general character. But the fragments which have survived may deservedly be described as 'Personal Reminiscences of Henry V'.

¹ xxv. 74-8.

² iii. 136.

³ For a fuller description and discussion see my Introduction. A brief quotation in Harley MS. 6216, f. 23 (Sigismund's visit) is somewhat earlier than either of the complete manuscripts.

I have discussed the statements and stories attributed to Ormonde at length elsewhere.² It will be sufficient here to give a bald list. The first is of Henry's continence after he became King; ¹ it was quoted by Harpsfield. The second ² is the story of the quarrel between Henry IV and his son, and of how the Prince came before his father, disguised in a gown of blue satin worked with eyelets, and was reconciled to him. This is followed by a long narrative of the King's death-bed discourse with the Prince.³ The whole of these are reproduced with very slight variation by Stow, through whom they have found an established place in our popular histories. Stow states expressly that Ormonde was a witness of the scene of the Prince's disguising. The next story is of how the young Henry would lie in wait for and rob his own receivers; ⁴ this is given 'as I have learned of the evidence before rehearsed, and also as the common fame is'. A little later comes the story of how, after his accession, Henry dismissed all the followers of his young acts.⁵ Both these stories are reproduced by Stow; the second appeared in a somewhat different form in Fabyan,⁶ and in one peculiar version of the Brut.⁷ No doubt they were, as alleged, matter of common fame. But the original of the scenes in Shakespeare's Henry IV relating to the robbery at Gadshill are to be traced back through Stow to this story of the Earl of Ormonde's. To Tito Livio's account of Henry's foundations at Sheen there is added a note on the abortive attempt to found a house of Celestins as 'heard of the tofore credible report'.⁸ The story that the archers at Agincourt were equipped with stakes by the advice of the Duke of York, is taken by Stow from the 'Translator'; it is found in some copies of the Brut.⁹ In the account of the visit of Sigismund in 1416 comes the story of how he was not permitted to land till he disclaimed imperial authority; ¹⁰ this is given 'as I have heard the Earl of Ormonde say, that he heard of credible report'; Holinshed has the story almost in the same words, but does not mention the source. In the account of the siege of Caen there is a new story of how Henry divided the spoils, reserving for himself only a French book of histories.¹¹ Under the siege of Rouen

¹ First English Life, pp. 3, 13.

² Id. pp. xx-xxxviii.

¹ First English Life, p. 5.

⁴ Id. p. 17. ⁸ p. 14.

⁸ First English Life, p. 20.

¹⁰ First English Life, p. 67.

² Id. pp. 11-13.

⁶ p. 577.

³ Id. pp. 13-16.

⁷ Brut, pp. 594-5.

⁹ Id. p. 55; Brut, p. 555.

¹¹ Id. p. 92.

there is another long and interesting story of how St. Vincent Ferrer came and preached in rebuke of the King, but was converted by Henry to acknowledge the justice of his cause.¹ The fact is confirmed by Otterbourne, and by the process at Vincent's canonization; Ormonde, whilst giving new details, has misplaced the visit, which took place at Caen in May 1418. A reference to Vincent's canonization shows that Ormonde's scribe wrote after 1455. The history of the siege of Melun includes a long story of Henry's fight in the mines with the Sire de Barbasan, and of his adversary's subsequent fate;² Holinshed reproduced this more briefly, and gave the 'Translator' as his authority.

To have carried back a whole group of the legends about Henry V to the middle of the fifteenth century has both an historical and a literary interest. Some of them were borrowed by Shakespeare from the versions given by Stow and Holinshed. The fidelity with which those writers reproduced their originals adds to their credibility in other matters, which they relate upon evidence still unknown. No doubt there was a good deal of floating legend about Henry V; and with this proof of the early date of some which have been doubted as sixteenth-century embellishments, we should hesitate to dismiss altogether any of the stories which have survived. The 'Translator' has preserved no trace of the story of Henry and the Chief Justice. But that story belongs to another cycle which relates to the Prince's riotous life in London. Of these latter I shall have something to say in the next chapter.³ Ormonde's stories relate not unnaturally to the Court and camp.

Apart from the Ormonde stories the 'Translator' has added nothing of historical importance. He inserts, it is true, long passages of his own composition, but they are for the most part moral disquisitions intended to point his purpose in writing. The work has, however, a distinct literary interest. In his preface the 'Translator' says that he had translated and reduced his originals into 'rude and homely English, from whome all pratique and famous inditinge is far exiled'. Nevertheless, by this modest profession he shows that he wrote with a conscious intention of style, and, as a matter of fact, in his paraphrasing and expansion of Livio's Vita he displays considerable literary skill, as he does also in combining it with material from other sources. His didactic purpose, he wrote for an example to Henry VIII, and his own comments, if not profound, are in their way evidence of his sense of the historian's duty. His care in the citation of his authorities deserves also to be noticed. He has travelled far on the way towards writing history on modern methods. In the development of historical literature his work has, moreover, a distinct place. Stow not only borrowed from it some of the Ormonde stories, but was content to adopt with very slight change the 'Translator's' renderings of Tito Livio and Monstrelet, even where they were erroneous. It is not too much to say that the 'Translator' is the true author of the main part of Stow's history of Henry V, and through Stow and Holinshed the chief originator of the traditional view of Henry's character. It had been his chief object to magnify the fame of Henry V as a model for Christian princes, and this he helped to achieve by emphasizing and popularizing the official eulogy of Tito Livio. It is a curious irony that by preserving Ormonde's stories he should have contributed still more to the creation of the contrary side of his hero's character as the wild Prince Hal.

¹ Id. pp. 130-2.

² Id. pp. 167-71.

³ See p. 107 below.

Edward Hall mentions amongst the authorities of whom he had made use 'John Basset', and in the text of his Chronicle, with reference to Henry V, writes: 'Peter Basset, esquire, which at the time of his death was his chamberlain, affirmeth that he died of a Plurisis.'¹ Bale² attributes to Peter Basset 'Acta Regis Henrici Quinti'. Tanner³ makes him author of 'De Actis Armorum et Conquestus Regni Franciae, ducatus Normanniae, ducatus Alenconiae, ducatus Andegaviae et Cenomanniae, etc. Ad nobilem virum Johannem Falstolf, baronem de Cyllequotem'. Hearne⁴ speaks of 'adversaria imperfecta' by Peter Basset, as preserved at the College of Arms; apparently he obtained his information from Anstis, and it should therefore be authentic. Basset's work is not

¹ Chronicle, pp. viii, 113; Holinshed (iii. 134) quotes from Hall.

² Scriptores, p. 568; Bale probably follows Hall.

³ Bibliotheca Britannica, 79.

⁴ Preface to Elmham's Vita, p. xxxi.

mentioned in Black's Catalogue of the Arundel MSS.; but it might conceivably be buried amongst the papers of William Worcester, who was Fastolf's secretary. The suggested identification¹ of it with a French history in Arundel MS. 48, ff. 236-69, is untenable; that work is a copy of the Chronique de Normandie.² From Hearne's description it does not seem likely that Basset's work was either long or important. There is no reason to suppose that Hall borrowed much from it; it might possibly have supplied him with such details as the names of persons knighted by Henry V.³ Basset's Christian name was probably John; there is no mention of a Peter Basset in the Patent Rolls; but a John Basset occurs as in the service of Henry V in 1418 and 1421.⁴

In the *Memorials of Henry V*⁵ in the Rolls Series there is a Life of Henry V, written in Latin by Robert Redmayne about 1540. It is a literary curiosity, but except for one or two small incidents, of which the chief is the story of the reception of the Emperor Sigismund by the Earl of Warwick at Calais,⁶ has no value as history. It has, however, a certain interest for the growth of the stories of the Prince and the Chief Justice, and of the pretended debate on the French war in 1414.⁷ For these matters Redmayne was probably indebted to Elyot and Hall.

The four Lives of Henry V with which this chapter has been chiefly concerned illustrate well the development of historical writing in England during the fifteenth century. We start with Elmham's Gesta, written in the manner and from the standpoint of a mediaeval churchman. We see in the works of Tito Livio and the Pseudo-Elmham the influence of the Early Renaissance and of classical models. The English translation of the Pseudo-Elmham shows how Latin was by the middle of the century losing its place as the popular medium, though there is yet no attempt at a new method of treatment. In the work of the 'Translator', just after the century had closed, we find a deliberate intention to write critical history in a form which would be acceptable to native readers.

¹ Notes and Queries, 2nd ser. ix. 512; Dict. Nat. Biog. iii. 384.

² Black, Catalogue, p. 84; see Gesta Henrici Quinti, p. viii.

³ Chronicle, p. 64.

⁴ Cal. Pat. Rolls, Henry V, ii. 148, 400.

⁵ pp. 1-59.

⁶ p. 49.

⁷ pp. 11, 25-30.

CHAPTER IV

THE CHRONICLES OF LONDON

THE Chronicles of London are perhaps the most important for the student of sources of all the original authorities for English history in the fifteenth century. This is partly due to the lack of other continuous and more detailed narratives. But they have also an intrinsic value of their own, both as being in their origin strictly contemporary, and as presenting the popular opinion of the time on the events which they record. They are further of importance for the constant use which was made of them by other writers of their own age, and also by the historians of the sixteenth century. It is hardly too much to describe them as the primary Chronicle source of the period. At all events there is no other work for which such a claim could be made.

The copies of these London Chronicles which have survived are so numerous, and vary so much from one another, that a careful study of their relative importance and interdependence is essential to their proper understanding. I dealt from this point of view with eight of the more important in the Introduction to my Chronicles of London. Whilst the main conclusions at which I there arrived stand, it is here necessary to take into account a number of other copies, some of which were not then accessible. First there are four versions for different periods between 1419 and 1446, which have been preserved as continuations of the Brut, and were printed by Dr. Brie in his edition of that Chronicle in 1908.¹ In the second place there are the copies contained in Mr. R. Flenley's Six Town Chronicles published in 1911. There are also a few others of less value.² But most important of all, the work quoted by John Stow as 'Fabian's MS.' has recently come to light and proved to be the fullest and most valuable copy of the London Chronicles which we possess.¹ In addition to the originals it is also necessary to take into account the versions preserved by Fabyan, and by Stow in his Summary of the Chronicles of England. Altogether there are nearly thirty known copies, none of which are entirely identical. It is not to be supposed that these represent more than a small proportion of those that formerly existed. This adds at once to the necessity of attempting some classification, and to the difficulty of formulating positive conclusions.

¹ Brut, pp. 440-90.

² See especially pp. 292-8 below.

I will, however, begin with a brief account of the general quality and characteristics of the Chronicles. At a very early date it was no doubt found convenient by those concerned with the government of the City to have a readily accessible record, giving at least the succession of civic officers. To the record thus established it was natural to add year by year notices, whether of landmarks in the history of the City, or of some great event which had made the year in question memorable. The oldest of such extant records was of a definitely official character, and is contained in the Liber de Antiquis Legibus,² compiled by Arnold Thedmar, an alderman, in 1274, and still preserved in the Record Room of the Guildhall. A second, which was perhaps also of an official character, is contained in the Annales Londonienses,³ possibly compiled by Andrew Horn, Chamberlain of the City, who died in 1328. Horn seems to have made use of a London Chronicle ending at 1289, which was probably to that point the main basis of the later English Chronicles of London. No doubt, however, there were written during the fourteenth century many other brief London Chronicles in Latin⁴ or French. Of the latter, instances are to be found in the French additions to the Liber de Antiquis Legibus, and in G. J. Aungier's French Chronicle of London.⁵

¹ It is being edited by Mr. E. H. Dring. Stow's title is a misnomer; see p. 83 below. The manuscript was formerly in the possession of Mr. W. Bromley-Davenport at Baginton Hall, Warwickshire; see Hist. MSS. Comm., 3rd Report, App. p. 229.

² Ed. by T. Stapleton for the Camden Society in 1846.

³ ap. Chronicles of the Reigns of Edward I and Edward II, i. 4-251, Rolls Series, 1882.

⁴ For an instance of a Latin Chronicle ending in 1388, see Hist. MSS. Comm. ii. 68; this manuscript belonged to John Stow. There is another, ending in 1382, in Egerton MS. 2885. See further, Chronicles of London, pp. v-viii.

⁵ Ed. for Camden Society in 1844.

Dr. Brie argues with good reason that a City Chronicle was the main source of the Brut or General English Chronicle for the reign of Richard II.¹ It was not, however, till about the beginning of the fifteenth century that the English Chronicles of London began to take shape, and their chief importance as historical sources belongs to that age. As noted, the copies are very numerous, and we can trace nearly a dozen more or less distinct recensions as having been made during the century. At its close Robert Fabyan cast his New Chronicles of England and of France in the form of a City Chronicle, and took for his chief authority in English affairs one of the fuller versions of the London Chronicle. Even after the invention of printing the tradition was strong, and till well into the reign of Elizabeth we find instances of manuscript records kept in mayoral annals by citizens of London. A London Chronicle from 1527 to 1555² was one of Stow's chief sources for the early editions of his Summary. The Greyfriars Chronicle,³ which ends in 1556, is another instance. Wriothesley, whose *Chronicle*⁴ ends in 1562, wrote in deliberate continuation of the City Chronicle of Richard Arnold, which was first printed in 1502. Stow himself put his Summary and its Abridgement in civic form, which he also retained for his Chronicles of England in 1580. Of Stow's Summary or Abridgement there were at least thirteen editions during his lifetime; three editions of the former were published after his death by Edmond Howes, the latest being dated in 1618.⁵ The long continuance of London Chronicles as a popular form of English history shows that they supplied a genuine need. Of their practical utility there is proof in Stow's description of the Summary Abridged as brought 'into a new form such as may both ease the purse and carriage', and in his insertion of a calendar, the terms, the distances of towns from London, and the dates of the principal fairs. If more evidence was needed it could be found in the numerous examples of similar ¹ Geschichte und Quellen, pp. 66, 67.

² Camden Miscellany, xii. 1-43, with another example for 1547-64 on pp. 44-9. See also Flenley, pp. 97, 98.

³ Monumenta Franciscana, ii. 143-260.

⁴ Ed. Camden Society, 2nd Series, 11, 20.

⁵ See Survey of London, i. lxxxii-lxxxiv.

chronicles kept in provincial towns. It cannot be doubted that the London Chronicles of the fifteenth century were in like manner intended to be of practical service to their owners.

It is the common characteristic of the London Chronicles that events are recorded under the years of the mayoralty, each year being headed by the names of the Mayor and Sheriffs, with in some instances the Guilds to which they belonged. A new reign has generally a heading in Latin or English: 'These be the names of Mayors and Sheriffs of the City of London in the time of King,' &c. The mayoral years are then numbered throughout the reign: 'Anno primo,' 'Anno secundo,' &c. The mayoral year of London in the Middle Ages began on October 29, the day when the mayor went to take his charge in the Exchequer at Westminster. Consequently the mayoral and regnal years were hardly ever even approximately coterminous. Hence arises some difficulty in the chronology, as to which caution is necessary. In the reign of Henry IV, when the true regnal year began on October 1, the difference was not of much moment. But in the reign of Henry V, though the true first regnal year began on March 20, 1413, the first year in the London Chronicles is naturally October 29, 1413, to October 28, 1414. Accordingly in Nicolas's *Chronicle of London*¹ the coronation of Henry V and the trial of Oldcastle appear under the last year of Henry IV. In *Gregory's Chronicle*² there is a note at this point—'Walderne, mayor, the same xiiij yere of his fadyr [Henry IV], and the fyrste yere of the sone [Henry V], and thys ys rekynde but for oone yere.' The writer then repeats Waldern as mayor for 'Anno primo Henrici quinti', and gives William Crowmer as mayor for the second year. But according to the more usual practice Crowmer would be reckoned as mayor for the first year. Gregory's Chronicle has in consequence the appearance of accuracy when it places Agincourt in the third instead of in the second mayoral year. For events which happened near the beginning or close of a mayoral year there is occasionally some confusion of chronology for the sake of convenience in the narrative. Thus Gregory's Chronicle places the reception of Henry V in London in November 1415, along with Agincourt, under Thomas Falconer's year. In the older version, in Nicolas's Chronicle of London, Agincourt appears under Falconer's year and the triumph under that of his successor. The fact is that Gregory's Chronicle is at this point a copy of a late recension made in 1440, of which the peculiarities here noted are characteristic. Any difficulties as to the dates can, as a rule, be solved by reference to an authoritative list of the mayors.¹ Generally the order of events is well preserved, especially in those parts of the Chronicles which most nearly represent the original contemporary record. In the Vitellius Chronicle for the reign of Henry VII the diary-like precision is so marked that an account of the Kentish rising of 1495 is interrupted to give at its proper date the dispensation of a citizen from serving as sheriff.²

¹ pp. 95, 96.

² p. 107.

The London Chronicles have sometimes been described as giving general English history from the point of view of the London citizen. This is not quite accurate, for as a rule the main theme of the Chronicles is afforded by events in and around London; and the Chronicles contain much that is of specific interest for civic history. Nevertheless, it is true that for the historian of a larger sphere, one of the main interests of the London Chronicles is that they do reflect in a measure the popular opinion of the capital on events of the time. It must be remembered in consequence that they are not written without prejudice, and that they are less authoritative for events at a distance, which they can only describe from report, than for those which took place in or near London and fell more or less within the writer's own knowledge. Along with much that is of general interest and importance the London Chronicles contain many small details, on robberies and fires in the City, on prices, and on the weather. Some of these are useful for social history, and some were no doubt of practical value at the time; but they are often trivial, and led Nash, in the reign of Elizabeth, to speak of 'lay chronographers that write of nothing but of Mayors and Sheriffs and the dere yere, and the great frost'.¹

¹ See Stow, Survey of London, ii. 149-86. For the fifteenth century the ordinary lists are as a rule accurate, but before 1300 errors are common.

² Chronicles of London, p. 206.

I will now turn to the history and classification of the Chronicles themselves. It is in the reign of Henry IV that the Chronicles first show signs of having been written in their present shape contemporaneously with the events which they record. In the earliest portion there are a number of small incidents, common to the majority of the Chronicles, which are clearly derived from a tablet of Latin historical memoranda formerly set up in St. Paul's Cathedral. This tablet, of which a copy is printed in Nicolas's *Chronicle of London*², ends in 1382. Thus we can fix the earliest date for the first composition of the English Chronicles. The year 1414 may be taken as approximately the latest date, since down to that point the variation of the different versions is nowhere so marked as to be incompatible with their derivation from a common original. Nor previous to that year is the division of the existing manuscripts into classes so clear as it becomes at a later stage. For instance, under 1409-10 it is evident that the accounts of John Badby's execution in Nicolas's Chronicle (or H.), Gregory's Chronicle (or G.), and the unprinted version of Cotton. MS. Julius B i all come from the same source; but the last named, which probably best represents the oldest version, in some verbal points resembles H. and in others G.; Julius B i in this year adds only a notice of the rebuilding of the Stocks Market, which is found in H. but not in G., and omits all reference to the 'hurling in East Cheap' by the King's sons, which is given by both H. and G.³

With the year of Agincourt there comes a marked divergence. Cotton. MS. Julius B ii resembles H., but not so closely that we can be certain of a common origin; Julius B i and G. have only textual variations, whilst the Vitellius Chronicle (or V.), which belongs to the same class, has some additional matter, which clearly comes from a source used in H., namely the story of how the news of Agincourt was received in London.⁴ The

¹ Pierce Penilesse, ap. Works, ii. 62.

² p. 175.

³ Id. p. 92; Gregory's Chronicle, p. 105. For the symbols made use of to designate various copies see the list on pp. 80-1 below.

⁴ Chronicles of London, p. 269.

existence of separate versions is further attested by the appearance under 1416-17 in H. of two distinct accounts of the sea-fight off Harfleur.¹ We can thus already distinguish two main classes: the first represented by Julius B ii and H., to which after 1420 the Cleopatra Chronicle (or C.) also belongs; the second by Julius B i, G., and V.

The date—1414—which is thus assumed for the early setting down in their present form of the English Chronicles of London is conjectural, and rests only on the internal evidence of the extant manuscripts. The first dates for which we can obtain other evidence are supplied by three nearly contemporary manuscripts—Harley 3775, St. John's College, Oxford, 57, and Cotton. Julius B ii—which end respectively in 1429, 1432, and 1432. But all three of these are clearly derived from older copies, and there can be little doubt that between 1414 and 1430 the London Chronicles were undergoing a constant process of rewriting and continuation. In the Introduction to my Chronicles of London I suggested that there was evidence for copies which ended in 1423 and 1427. The first of these dates is supported by the close resemblance to this point of Julius B i and G.; whilst the second seemed to be indicated by the absence of any notice for 1427-8 in Julius B ii, and the interruption of its closest resemblance to H. and C.² I had not then discovered the early copy in Harley 3775, which resembles H. to 1417, and from that date to 1429 agrees in turn with Julius B ii, H., and C. A comparison of these four manuscripts suggests the possibility of copies which ended in 1417, 1419, 1421, and 1425.³ It might be difficult to establish a positive case for any particular date. But the cumulative evidence of variation and agreement in the manuscripts is strongly in favour of their derivation from older and divergent copies ending at various dates.

With 1430-2 we come to surer ground, and there can, I think, be no question of the completion of an important version in each of those three years. I will state briefly the evidence for each in turn.

Version of 1430. The primary evidence is still internal.

¹ Nicolas, Lond. Chron. pp. 101, 102, 104.

² Chronicles of London, p. xix.

³ See further, p. 292 below.

For 1429-30 H., Julius B ii, and C. all have a common original; for 1430-1 and 1431-2 the two latter are in close agreement, but H. follows another source. The most probable explanation is that they were all derived from an original ending in 1430.¹ There are other reasons for believing in the existence of this original. An important version of the Brut, which, as will be seen in the next chapter, is dependent on the London Chronicles, ends with this year.² Moreover, the versions of 1431 and 1432, though markedly divergent from one another, both show signs of derivation from a fuller and probably common source. Such a source is to be found in 'Fabian's MS.', which, on account of its exceptional fullness, may be fitly described as The Great Chronicle.

It is true that in its present form The Great Chronicle belongs to the later recension of 1440; but down to 1430 it is nevertheless the fullest copy which we possess, and combines in a superior form the distinctive features of both of the succeeding versions of 1431 and 1432. I conclude, therefore, that 1430 is the date of the first important recension of the Chronicles of London for which we can now obtain positive evidence. Traces of this version appear also to be preserved in H., in Dr. Brie's Appendix D, E., and Appendix E,³ and Stow's copy in Harley 540.

Version of 1431. This is well marked by 1430-1 as the last year for which the late copy Julius B i agrees with the ancient Vitellius F ix. The similar version of St. John's College, Oxford, MS. 57 ends with the names of the civic officers for 1432-3.⁴

Version of 1432. For this we have conclusive evidence in Julius B ii, which ends with Lydgate's verses on the reception at London in February 1432. The Longleat MS., a sixteenth-century copy, appears to represent this version in a somewhat superior form.⁵

It has been important to state briefly the evidence in support of the early versions of the Chronicles of London in order

¹ The expression 'and he is called Martinus Quintus', which is peculiar to Julius B ii (Chronicles of London, p. 72), points to an original written before February 1431.

² See pp. 116-17 below.

⁴ Flenley, Six Town Chronicles, p. 62.

³ Brut, pp. 440, 444, 452.

⁵ Id. pp. 57-60.

to bring out their strictly contemporary character. It will now be useful to summarize the results thus far obtained. The English Chronicles of London were first put into shape towards 1414. To this original continuations were added from time to time, between 1417 and 1430. An important and probably very full version was compiled in 1430, and from it were derived in 1431 and 1432 two versions which have well-marked and distinctive characteristics. With the conclusions thus obtained from the London Chronicles themselves it is instructive to compare the evidence furnished by their derivative, the Brut. As I shall show in the next chapter, there are traces of versions of the Brut which ended in 1415 and 1417; a version which ended in 1419 was probably made a little before 1430; and an important version ending with 1430 was certainly made in that or the succeeding year.¹ The close agreement of these two sets of dates (arrived at independently) is remarkable, and its significance can hardly be set aside.

With 1430-2 we have reached a marked stage in the development of the London Chronicles. That development was, however, continuous and progressive. The production of three separate versions within three years is sufficient proof that the Chronicles were in great request. Under such circumstances new copies were constantly being produced, with continuations bringing them up to date. There is evidence for the completion of more than one such copy during the following eight years (1432-40).² It would be a natural tendency for these latest additions to be long, and to include matter of only passing interest. It would also be natural that after a while some revised version should obtain a special vogue. The result of these tendencies appears in the next important stage.

Version of 1440. This was to prove the most permanent of all the early versions. Its existence is most clearly shown by the fact that the close agreement of Gregory's Chronicle (G.) and the Vitellius Chronicle (V.) ends at this point. Here also the first hands both of V. and of The Great Chronicle stop. Confirmatory evidence is to be found in other quarters. It is with 1441 that the Latin Chronicle in Rawlinson B 355, and Robert Bale's Chronicle begin to be of independent interest.¹ Evidence of a similar kind is to be found in Worcester's Annales,² and perhaps also in Giles's Chronicle of Henry VI.³ The version of 1440 was essentially a compilation based on earlier versions, though preserving some matter not found in most earlier copies still extant or represented. But its greatest interest for us consists in the fact that it formed the basis of the most important later version.

¹ See pp. 118-19, 131-2, 299-301 below.

² Vitellius F ix ending in 1439, and the Eshton Hall MS. ending in 1440, are instances. See p. 84 below. Cambridge Univ. Libr. Hh vi. 9 has a copy ending in 1434.

Version of 1445. This is represented only by Dr. Brie's F., and in a shortened form in Stow's copy in Harley 540. The first ends with the civic officers for 1445-6; the latter goes on to give a short notice for 1446-7.

Version of 1446. A number of copies show that at this date a much abbreviated version was compiled, to be used by later writers as the basis for their longer continuations.

The version of 1446 was the last definite recension of the earlier Chronicles. But numerous continuations appeared, and these may be grouped conveniently in three classes:—

(a) Continuations of S., or the Short Version of 1446, to the early years of Edward IV.

(b) Miscellaneous continuations from 1440 to various dates.

(c) The Main City Chronicle, which was the source of the continuations of The Great Chronicle and of V., of Caxton's Chronicles, and of Fabyan.

I will now proceed to a formal classification of the extant copies of the Chronicles of London. It must, however, be remembered that of the main versions only those for 1431, 1432, and 1445 are represented by strictly contemporary copies; free from subsequent continuations. Some of the most important copies are as late as the reign of Edward IV. There is always the possibility that the scribe of a particular copy may have derived material from more than one of the earlier versions, or may have omitted things which did not appear to him to be of sufficient interest. As a matter of fact, nearly all the extant copies contain some matter of peculiar value, whether in their independent conclusions, or in passages which in the process of selection chance to have been specially retained from some older version. In consequence there is much overlapping, and it is often difficult to assign a particular copy without qualification to a particular class. For the sake of simplicity I avoid any attempt at minute subdivision, and content myself with an arrangement under the main groups. For a similar reason the independent continuations of copies of the early versions will be dealt with in the classes to which their main texts belong; the presence of such continuations will be shown by the date or dates attached. It will be obvious that some copies must appear in more than one class.

¹ Flenley, Six Town Chronicles, pp. 64, 71.

² See p. 163 below.

³ See p. 157 below.

Title.	Date.	Printed.
I. VERSIONS OF 1430-2.
(a) Version of 1430.
The Great Chronicle	1440, 1496, 1512	Ed. E. H. Dring, 1913.
Harley 3775	1429	See pp. 292-5 below.
Harley 565 = H.	1443	Nicolas, Chronicle of London , pp. 1-133; 1829.
Eshton Hall MS. ?	1440	(See Hist. MSS. Commission , 3rd Report, p. 299).
Appendix D	1428	Brut , pp. 440-3; ed. Brie, 1908.
E.	1430	Id. pp. 444-51.
Appendix E	1431	Id. pp. 452-5.
(b) Version of 1431.
St. John's College, Oxford, 57	1432	(See Flenley, pp. 60-2).
Vitellius F ix	1439	(See Chronicles of London , pp. xiii, xiv).
Julius B i	1483	{ Nicolas, pp. 153-71; Collections of a London Citizen , pp. 258-62; Chronicles of London , pp. 279-88.
(c) Version of 1432.
Julius B ii	1432	Chronicles of London , pp. 1-116; 1905.
Longleat MS.	1432	Flenley, pp. 99-101; 1911.
Cleopatra C iv = C.	1443	Chronicles of London , pp. 117-52; 1905.
Arundel 19 (College of Arms)	1432, 1452	See pp. 296-8 below.

Title.	Date.	Printed.
II. VERSION OF 1440. The Great Chronicle Gregory's Chronicle = G.	1496, 1512 1470	Ed. E. H. Dring, 1913. Collections of a London Citizen , pp. 57-183, ed. J. Gairdner, Camden Society, 1876.
Vitellius A xvi = V.	1496, 1509	Chronicles of London , pp. 153-4, 265-75.
Rawlinson B 355	1459	Flenley, pp. 101-13, 1911.
Robert Bale's Chronicle	1461	Id. pp. 114-53.
III. VERSION OF 1445. F.	1445	Brut , pp. 456-90.
Harley 540	1447	See pp. 295-6 below.
IV. VERSION OF 1446. ¹ Short English Chronicle = S.	—	Three Fifteenth Century Chronicles , pp. 1-65, ed. J. Gairdner, Camden Society, 1880.
Julius B i	—	Nicolas, Lond. Chron. pp. 133-5, 171-3.
Harley Roll C 8	—	—
Gough, London, 10	—	—
V. CONTINUATIONS OF S. Short English Chronicle	1465	u.s. pp. 65-80.
Julius B i	1461	u.s. pp. 135-41.
Harley Roll C 8	1462	—
Arundel 19 (College of Arms)	1452	See pp. 296-8 below.
VI. MISCELLANEOUS CHRONICLES, 1440-85. Robert Bale's Chronicle	1461	Flenley, pp. 114-53.
Gregory's Chronicle	1470	Collections of a London Citizen , pp. 183-239.
Julius B i	1483	Nicolas, Lond. Chron. pp. 142-7.
VII. THE MAIN CITY CHRONICLE, 1440-85. The Great Chronicle	1496, 1512	Ed. E. H. Dring, 1913.
Vitellius A xvi = V.	1496, 1509	Chronicles of London , pp. 154-93.
Rawlinson B 355	1459	Flenley, pp. 101-13.
Gough, London, 10	1471, 1495	Id. pp. 153-64.
Fabyan's Chronicle	1485, 1509	Ed. Ellis, 1812.
See also : Caxton's Chronicles	1461	Brut , pp. 491-533

¹ All the copies of this version have continuations.

I will now discuss the main characteristics and importance of the several extant copies under their classes in order.

I. THE VERSIONS OF 1430-2

It has seemed best to put the versions of these three years in one class, with subdivisions, because the version of 1430 can only be restored conjecturally, and because the two versions of 1431 and 1432 appear to branch off directly from it.

(a) Version of 1430.

The Great Chronicle. Although this copy in its present form belongs to the version of 1440, it appears to represent most fully the earlier version of 1430, since it combines the characteristic features of both the versions of 1431 and 1432. Like Julius B i it gives the appointments for the surrender of French towns,¹ and the terms of the Treaty of Troyes; the feasts made for Sigismund in 1416, and at the coronations of Catherine in 1421 and of Henry VI in 1430;² the full accounts of the Parliaments of 1423-8;³ the full text of Henry Beaufort's letter to Bedford in 1426;⁴ the English conquests in Guienne;⁵ and Philip of Burgundy's letter to Henry VI in May 1430.⁶ Like Julius B ii it has the long account of the revolution of 1399,⁷ the text of the Lollards' Bill of 1410,⁸ and the Articles and Arbitrament between Henry Beaufort and Humphrey of Gloucester in 1426.⁹ In smaller matters it appears to approach more nearly to H. The story of how after the affray at St. Dunstan's in the East in 1417 the Lord Strange had to do penance seems to be peculiar; it is quoted by Stow.¹⁰

It is thus clear that in The Great Chronicle we have the most ample extant representation of the English Chronicles of London in their earliest form. Its identity with the volume which Stow repeatedly quoted as 'Fabian's MS.'¹¹ is shown by its complete agreement with his citations; notes in Stow's

¹ Falaise, Rouen, Meaux, Pont-Meulan, Le Mans. Cf. Collections of a London Citizen, pp. 117-38, 143-8, 150-3, 258-62; Chronicles of London, p. 286.

² Nicolas, Chron. Lond. pp. 162-5, 168-9; for Sigismund see Gregory's Chronicle, p. 113. ³ Chronicles of London, pp. 279-88. ⁴ Id. p. 84.

⁵ Id. pp. 283-4. ⁶ Nicolas, p. 170. ⁷ Chronicles of London, pp. 19-62.

⁸ Id. pp. 65-8. ⁹ Id. pp. 76-94. ¹⁰ Annales, p. 352.

¹¹ See Chronicles of London, pp. xxvii-xxix; Survey of London, ii. 275, 280, 283, 303, 305-6, 310, 317, 365-6, 377.

writing appear in various places. Stow's description of it suggested that it was a manuscript copy of Fabyan's own Chronicle, or at least of the London portion of it. That it certainly is not; for instance, in the Lollards' Bill it agrees with Julius Bii, and not with the printed Fabyan, and in 1432 Lydgate's verses are given without Fabyan's characteristic variations. It is possible, however, that the manuscript may have belonged to Fabyan, though the later continuation must have been added after his death. It seems to have been used for the 1559 edition of Fabyan. A hand of the middle of the seventeenth century has added a fly-leaf in which it is described as 'Fabyan's Chronicle'. In 1702 it was in the possession of the family of Bromley-Davenport at Baginton Hall in Warwickshire, where it remained till a few years ago.¹ The earlier portion, down to 1440, is in a hand of the reign of Edward IV. With the contents subsequent to 1430 I shall deal later.²

The Chronicles in Harley 3775, and Nicolas's Chronicle of London, or H., are best placed under the version of 1430 because, apart from The Great Chronicle, they seem to represent most nearly the original archetype. These two Chronicles are closely related, and lack both the sets of long documents which are distinctive of the versions of 1431 and 1432, all of which seem to have been comprised in the version of 1430. This omission, coupled with the fact that Harley 3775 ends with the names of the civic officers for 1429-30, may point to the early circulation of a shorter version. In other respects, however, the two Harley copies, at all events down to 1417, furnish us conjointly with one of the fullest examples which has survived. Harley 3775, though the older manuscript, is of distinctive importance only for 1413-14, and for 1418-19, in which two years it best preserves the older originals.³ Before

¹ See Hist. MSS. Comm. ii. 80, where it is very imperfectly described. See also Lot 326 in Catalogue of Sale, May 8, 1903, at Sotheby's. It is no doubt the copy of Fabyan which Sir H. Ellis described as existing in a private Library in Warwickshire. I have to thank Mr. E. H. Dring for his great courtesy in allowing me to examine the manuscript, which is now in the possession of Mr. Quaritch.

² See pp. 91, 100, 101 below.

³ See further, pp. 292-5 below; there are a few small points of a similar quality between 1414 and 1416.

1413 and between 1421 and 1425 it is inferior to H., and as regards those periods does not call for separate consideration. More perhaps than any of the other copies H. is throughout of a distinctively civic character. But though events in or about London are its chief concern, it includes also some matter of wider interest. The account of the relations between Henry of Monmouth and his father in 1412¹ is of peculiar value; and for small points concerning the Lollard movement² and the French war it is helpful in conjunction with the longer accounts. Under 1423-4 there is a story of how Henry VI, then less than three years old, cried and screamed when they tried to make him travel on a Sunday;³ this might have been taken for part of the saintly legend of the King but for its appearance in a Chronicle of such early date; it is given also in the version of 1431.⁴ The allusion to Joan of Arc as a false witch, through whose help our adversaries trusted to have conquered all France, for they held her amongst them for a prophetess and a worthy goddess,⁵ is interesting as the one absolutely contemporary reference in English sources outside Records; the conclusion that it was written in 1430 is confirmed by the absence of any reference to Joan's execution.

For the next eight years, from 1431 to 1439, H., preserving its civic character, is not peculiarly valuable. Down to 1439 it is closely resembled by Vitellius F ix, which ends 'and that made Bakers lordes, but I pray God lette us never see that day no more, if hit be his wille'.⁶ The Eshton Hall MS. ended originally in the following year with: 'And the good man of the Egle had moche harme as it is seyde.'⁷ H. and these two other copies may represent a Continuation compiled in 1439-40. For the last four years, 1439-43, H. is independent and valuable; like all the London Chronicles it is of interest for the downfall of Eleanor Cobham. At the end of the manuscript there are given Lydgate's verses on the reception of

¹ Nicolas, Lond. Chron. pp. 94, 95.

² Id. pp. 97, 99; cf. pp. 293-4 below.

³ Id. p. 112.

⁴ Chronicles of London, pp. 279-80.

⁵ Nicolas, p. 118; cf. Chronicles of London, p. 96, and Brut, p. 439.

⁶ Chronicles of London, p. xiv; cf. Nicolas, p. 124; nothing seems to have been lost at the end of Vitellius F ix.

⁷ Hist. MSS. Comm. iii. 299; cf. Nicolas, p. 126 (where the reading is 'was seyde'). The first hand of the Eshton Hall MS. ends here.

Henry VI at London in February 1432; this seems to indicate that the writer had used a copy of the version of 1432 in addition to his principal original. The date at which H. was written is fixed for 1443-4 by a list of the Kings of England on folio 1 of the manuscript (Harley 565), where Henry VI is stated to have reigned twenty-one years.

The Chronicle in Dr. Brie's Appendix D¹ would seem to belong to the version of 1430; unless, as is possible, it represents a still earlier copy. But it is connected closely with Dr. Brie's D.,² which is the 1430 version of the Brut. In these two Chronicles the City Chronicle appears in the process of transformation into a continuous narrative in chapters as part of the Brut; in D. the process is complete; in Appendix D the names of mayors and sheriffs are given, but only for four years out of ten, whilst the successive paragraphs begin 'And in this same yere', without any indication of change of date. The chronology must therefore be rectified by comparison with more perfect copies. In its contents Appendix D most nearly resembles H., though in some details it approximates to Julius B ii and C., and has also some peculiar matter especially under 1427-8.

Dr. Brie's E. and Appendix E end respectively in 1430 and 1431.³ E. is marked by an account of the coronation feast of Queen Catherine, but these Chronicles from 1427 to 1430 show more resemblance to G. than to Julius B i. It is therefore more reasonable to regard them as based on the version of 1430 than on its derivative of 1431. The notice for 1431 in Appendix E is unimportant. Both E. and Appendix E preserve their civic form; the former as printed puts the events of 1427-8 under 1423-4, but a leaf may be missing in the manuscript.⁴

The specimens of City Chronicles which have thus been preserved in the Brut all come from manuscripts of a late date, but appear to preserve something of the version of 1430, or of the earlier copies from which that version was compiled.

¹ Brut, pp. 440-3: from Cambridge Univ. Libr. MS. Hh vi. 9.

² Id. pp. 394-439.

³ Brut, pp. 444-55: E. comes from Egerton MS. 650 at the British Museum, Appendix E from Rawlinson MS. B 173 in the Bodleian Library.

⁴ Between f. 113 and f. 114; cf. Brut, p. 449.

No doubt they were added by the scribes in order to carry on the imperfect narrative in the copy of the Brut which they were using. This is illustrated by a naïve note in Egerton MS. 650, the main narrative of which ends in 1418.¹ The scribe there explains :

‘ Here is no more of the sege of Rone : and þat is because we wanted þe trewe copy þerof : bot who so euer owys þis boke may wryte it oute in þe henderend of þis boke, or in þe forþerend of it, whene he gettes þe trew copy.’

This indicates that the addition of civic endings to copies of the Brut was due merely to the lack of more finished material. That the continuation stops short with 1430 may be accepted as proof that the scribe's copy of the City Chronicle extended no further.

(b) Version of 1431.

The distinctive features of this version have been specified above.² The most characteristic are the agreements for the surrender of towns in France. The long account of the revolution of 1399 and the Lollards' Bill do not appear. Under 1425-6 the Arbitrament between Henry Beaufort and Humphrey of Gloucester is given, but the Articles are omitted, though Beaufort's letter to Bedford is quoted in full instead of partially as in the version of 1432.³ For this year the versions of 1431 and 1432 must have had a common original, which we can find in The Great Chronicle. For the reign of Henry IV this version of 1431 has a certain interest as resembling sometimes H. and sometimes G. For the year of Agincourt the narrative shows some resemblance to that of C. Under Henry VI the most valuable things are the accounts of the treason of Sir John Mortimer, and of the financial legislation of the Parliaments of 1423 to 1428.

Of the three chief copies of this version the St. John's College MS. is noteworthy as one of the oldest extant copies of the English Chronicles of London. It ends with the names of the City officers for 1432-3, and was probably written not long afterwards. In some places it seems to resemble H. more closely than Julius B i, but it contains nothing of value which is not printed elsewhere.¹ The other two—Vitellius F ix and Julius B i—present only textual variations. The former is an early copy, probably written in 1439; the latter a very late one, not earlier than 1483. After 1432 Vitellius F ix is related to H., and Julius B i to S.

¹ At ‘manfully countered with our Englysshmen’; see Brut, p. 390, l. 28. Egerton 650 thus far follows the version of the Brut, which ends in 1419; see p. 116 below.

² See on p. 82 above.

³ Cf. Chronicles of London, p. 84.

(c) Version of 1432.

Of this version the most obvious characteristic is the inclusion of Lydgate's verses on the reception of Henry VI, with which it originally ended. But it is also remarkable for having preserved from its longer original the account of the revolution of 1399, the Lollards' Bill, and the Articles and Arbitrament of 1425-6. These documents occupy by far the greater part of the Chronicle. The rest of the narrative resembles H., but is very much shorter and consequently of less value. The account of the revolution of 1399² is similar to those in the Annales Ricardi Secundi and Annales Henrici Quarti,³ but is on the whole the most complete history of the Parliament of 1399 which has survived. As compared with the Annales it presents some marked variations. The account of Henry's coronation is quite different; there is a nearly complete list of the new knights of the Bath, and the actual words of the challenge of Dymmok, the King's champion, are given. But of more importance are the minute and vivid descriptions of the scenes between Aumarle and his opponents during the subsequent sessions of the Parliament. This English narrative is a translation of Latin and French originals, of which imperfect copies are preserved in Bodley MS. 596, where they occur in association with a brief London Chronicle in Latin, which ends in 1418.⁴ A translation of part of the Bodley MS. is printed in Archaeologia.⁵ This narrative was made use of by Fabyan, and through him by Holinshed, probably from a copy of The Great Chronicle.

The Lollards' Bill of 1410 is incorrectly assigned in Julius B ii

¹ Flenley, pp. 60-2.

² Chronicles of London, pp. 19-62.

³ Annales, &c., pp. 254-311.

⁴ With the untimely end of John Bryan, see p. 295 below.

⁵ xx. 275-81.

to 1407. The Great Chronicle and the Longleat MS., like Walsingham¹ and Fabyan,² give the true date. The text of the Bill was long known only through an imperfect copy preserved by Fabyan. It is noteworthy that The Great Chronicle agrees with the other London Chronicles and not with Fabyan. Fabyan's inclusion of it in his Chronicle may have been the cause of the traditional censure of his work by Cardinal Wolsey. The Lollards' Bill is very similar to a document put forth by Jack Sharpe in 1431;³ the near coincidence of this with the revision of the London Chronicle in 1430 is interesting, but probably accidental.

The Articles and Arbitrament of 1425-6, as given in the version of 1432, lack the full text of Beaufort's letter to Bedford. Thus the documents are complete only in The Great Chronicle, whilst the version of 1431 is less perfect than that of 1432. The London Chronicles furnish us with the oldest extant copies of these documents, superior alike to the official text in the Rolls of Parliament,⁴ and to the late and somewhat different copies in the Chronicles of Arnold⁵ and Hall.⁶ The prejudice of the London Chronicles is illustrated by the favour which they show at this point for Humphrey of Gloucester.

Lydgate's verses for the pageant of February 1432 come in the body of the text in all true copies of the version of 1432. Their appearance in The Great Chronicle shows that it followed this version as the continuation of the previous version of 1430. H., as noted above, has the verses at the end of the manuscript. The Longleat MS. stops short in the middle at the second line of the twenty-third stanza.

Of minor matters in the version of 1432 the only noteworthy point is the account of Agincourt, which differs somewhat from that in H. The Longleat MS. has a few variants (of no great importance) from Julius B ii; they are printed by Mr. Flenley.⁷

The Cleopatra Chronicle (or C.) is naturally assigned to the version of 1432, by the inclusion of Lydgate's verses in the text. But it is only for the years from 1420 to 1432 that it belongs strictly to this class. From 1420 to 1429 it agrees

¹ Hist. Angl. ii. 282. ² p. 575. ³ ap. Amundesham, Annales, i. 453-6.

⁴ Rolls of Parliament, iv. 296-8. ⁵ Customs of London, pp. 287-300.

⁶ Chronicle, pp. 130-7.

⁷ Flenley, pp. 99-101.

very closely with Harley 3775, except that under 1424-5 it gives the sentence omitted in that copy.¹ Consequently it agrees with Julius B ii for 1421 to 1425, as it does again for 1429 to 1432. C. begins imperfectly in 1415 and ends in 1443. The notices for 1417 to 1420 are an insertion made on a blank page from the short version of 1446.² Those for 1440 to 1443 agree nearly with H. The rest of the Chronicle consists of two peculiar and valuable passages, viz. for the years 1415 and 1416, and 1433 to 1440. The first begins imperfectly in the middle of the siege of Harfleur, and ends in June 1416. Linguistically it is the most ancient passage in the London Chronicles, and historically it is one of the most valuable. It may be described as a cento of original documents, which is the more precious by reason of the lack of skill which prevented the compiler from destroying their true character. The lists of hostages at Harfleur and the itinerary of Agincourt appear to be based on official or semi-official records. In the account of the battle itself we get a noteworthy ballad, of which the compiler began, but fortunately did not finish, a prose paraphrase. The list of prisoners agrees so closely with the apparently official bulletin, of which a copy is preserved in the Salisbury City archives,³ that we are justified in assuming that it is derived therefrom.⁴ Under 1416 there is a useful notice of the fighting round Harfleur, and a description of the early part of the visit of Sigismund, which is important as showing the popular opinion on the negotiations between the Emperor, the English king, and the French princes. As noted in the previous chapter,⁵ the original appears to have been known to Tito Livio, perhaps through a copy of the Brut, one version of which shows points of resemblance to the Cleopatra Chronicle.⁶ The second independent part of C., from 1432 to 1440, is of peculiar interest for the frequent notices of the war in France down to 1438. They are valuable both as one of the best of the scanty narratives of the war

¹ See p. 292 below.

² See p. 94 below, and Chronicles of London, pp. 126-7.

³ Printed by Champollion-Figeac in Lettres de Rois, Reines, &c., ii. 337-9 (Documents inédits sur l'histoire de France).

⁴ Harley 3775 supplies the explanation; see p. 294 below.

⁵ See p. 54 above.

⁶ Brut, pp. 554-7; see p. 123 below.

from the English side, and also as supplementing the fuller accounts of the French writers. A chronicle of the same type was made use of by Hall in the sixteenth century. Apart from its account of the war C. between 1433 and 1440 resembles G. and V., but with some additions in the last three years. C. is a composite Chronicle written in three different hands of about the same date: (1) for 1415-16; (2) for 1417-20; (3) for 1420-43. The third cannot be earlier than 1446, since reference is made to the confinement of Eleanor Cobham in the Isle of Man.¹ The second is probably the latest written.

Arundel 19 at the College of Arms is an abbreviated copy of this version. It does not contain any of the documents which are characteristic of the longer copies; but is marked as belonging to this version by a prose paraphrase of Lydgate's verses, and by the fact that its chief original did not extend beyond 1432. At one point it shows a slight resemblance to *Gregory's Chronicle*² and to the version of 1431³ in giving a brief account of the attack on St. James de Beuvron in 1426. The notices from 1432 to 1446 are very meagre; but the Chronicle from 1446 to 1452 is of a special character.⁴ The manuscript was probably written in 1475, since the names of the mayors and sheriffs are entered down to that year. But the Chronicle is clearly a copy of an original written in 1452. A sixteenth-century hand has added a few notes for the later years.

It has been convenient to treat the contents of the versions of 1431 and 1432 separately. But it will be obvious that the whole of the versions of 1430-2 will be best used in The Great Chronicle, which combines the long version of 1430 with the Continuation of 1432. For the eight subsequent years to 1440 the narrative of The Great Chronicle is of an ordinary civic type, approximating most nearly to that of G.

II. THE VERSION OF 1440

It is clear that a number of copies of the London Chronicles ended in or about 1440. With the simple continuations of which H. may be taken as representative we are not further

¹ Chronicles of London, p. 149.

² p. 161.

³ Nicolas, London Chronicle, p. 167.

⁴ See pp. 95 and 296-8 below.

concerned. But it is also clear that in this year there was a revision of the Chronicles, which obtained popularity as the standard text to that date. This is now represented directly by G. and V. Its main source was naturally the version of 1430. Down to 1423 it resembles the version of 1431 in giving the agreements for the surrender of French towns, though it does not do so as fully. Between 1423 and 1430 it resembles rather H., and Dr. Brie's E. and Appendix E. This may be accounted for by its independent derivation from the version of 1430; or it may be due to the existence of separate versions for 1423-30. The Articles of 1425-6 do not appear at all, though the narrative for these years is fuller than that of H. Like the version of 1431 it contains the coronation feasts, and is peculiar for its long description of the ceremonies at the English coronation of Henry VI. It shows affinity to the version of 1432 by giving a paraphrase of Lydgate's verses; much of the narrative for 1430-2 comes from that version. From 1432 to 1440 this version most nearly resembles the civic part of C. Of the two principal manuscripts V. is on the whole the better copy; the first chronicle in V. ends at this point, and is written in a hand of the latter part of Henry VI; it preserves some noteworthy variations.¹ G. is a later copy, probably written in 1470. The chronological peculiarities for 1413-14, and 1415-16² are a feature of the version of 1440; their appearance in The Great Chronicle marks that copy as derived from the version of 1440 as well as from those of 1430 and 1432.

Robert Bale seems to have taken the version of 1440 as the basis for his own Chronicle.³ The Latin Chronicles in Rawlinson B 355⁴ and in William of Worcester's *Annales*⁵ are derived from this version. There may also be traces of it in Giles's Chronicle of Henry VI.⁶

III. THE VERSION OF 1445

This is a peculiar version, containing exceptional matter which calls for special notice. It is best represented by ¹ See Chronicles of London, pp. 265-75.

³ Flenley, p. 71.

⁵ See p. 163 below.

² See pp. 73, 74 above.

⁴ Id. p. 64.

⁶ See p. 157 below.

Dr. Brie's F.,¹ which covers the period for 1430 to 1445, but gives the names of the mayor and sheriffs for 1445-6; it may therefore be assigned at the latest to the early part of 1446. Another copy, in the writing of John Stow in Harley MS. 540, preserves some, but not all, of the most interesting passages of this version; it begins, however, in 1420, and adds a brief notice for 1446-7 on the combat between an armourer and his servant in Smithfield, which is given in a different form in G. Stow's original clearly differed from Dr. Brie's F. The early part of Harley 540, from 1420 to 1430, is very brief, but has a few things otherwise found only in Dr. Brie's three earlier civic texts; like them it may preserve relics of the version of 1430 or its older sources.² The narrative from 1430 to 1440 may represent the fuller original of the civic part of C., and of the version of 1440; the concluding portion, from 1440 to 1445, is new and of great interest. Apart from the military chronicle peculiar to C., this version of 1445 is for its period the most valuable which has survived. Between 1430 and 1440 there are fuller notices of various small matters found in other copies and also some that are new, particularly in civic matters. But there are likewise some passages of wider interest. The chief of these is a long account of the reception of Henry VI at Paris in December 1431; it confirms the narratives of Monstrelet³ and the Journal d'un Bourgeois de Paris,⁴ but is independent of them; probably it is derived from the narrative inserted in 'Letter-book K'⁵ at the Guildhall, which Delpit thought might have been written by the Master of the Ceremonies, and described as surpassing all other accounts in its wealth of detail.⁶ The similar description of the London pageant for Henry's return in February 1432 seems also to be the work of an eyewitness, and to be independent of Lydgate's verses; 'Letter-book K' may again be the source, the narrative given there was written by ¹ Brut, pp. 456-90, from Trin. Coll. Camb. MS. O 9. 1. Another copy—Camb. Univ. Libr. Hh vi. 9—ends in 1434: this is the manuscript from which Appendix D comes.

² See pp. 295-6 below.

³ Chroniques, v. 1-7.

⁴ pp. 274-80, ed. Tuetey.

⁵ Sharpe, Calendar of Letter-book K, pp. 135-7.

⁶ Delpit, Collection des Documents, pp. clx, 238-44.

John Carpenter, the town clerk.¹ The descriptions of the pageants appear in both copies of this version. Dr. Brie's F. alone has a long account of the siege of Calais in 1436, and of Humphrey of Gloucester's expedition into Flanders,² which is the fullest and most original of the narratives for these events in the London Chronicles.

In the concluding portion for 1440 to 1445 the most noteworthy passage is an entirely novel account of the fall of Eleanor Cobham.³ A story that she fell under suspicion of witchcraft by reason of a storm which overtook the King when riding through London on July 19, 1441, would be untenable on grounds of chronology alone; but it is interesting for the suggestion that the attack on her was due to her own unpopularity, and was not merely a political move on the part of her husband's enemies. The further novel statement that Eleanor and Humphrey were 'devorsed and departed as for matrimony made before between them two' is of interest both as showing why Eleanor was subsequently styled 'late duchess of Gloucester', and also for its suggestion that there was an endeavour to save the Duke's honour, and that Humphrey himself may not have been an altogether unwilling party to the proceedings. On the other hand there is evidence that Eleanor was not without her sympathizers; the ordinary London Chronicles mention the fate of a poor woman who used ungodly words to the King and was pressed to death for refusing to plead;⁴ here it is added that she 'reviled the King for dame Eleanor, that he should have her home to her husband . . . with which words the King waxing wroth, took it to heart and sent her to prison'. Eleanor is alleged to have denied the charge against her, and 'said that she did it for to have borne a child by her lord'; this refers clearly to the image which she was said to have made for the King's undoing, but it puts a different complexion on the purpose of her practice of the black art.

A large part of the rest of the Chronicle is occupied with the marriage of Margaret of Anjou, and is of particular interest for the narrative of Suffolk's embassy to Tours for

¹ Liber Albus, ii. 457-64, Rolls Series.

² Brut, pp. 469-70.

³ Id. pp. 477-82.

⁴ Nicolas, p. 133; Chronicles of London, p. 152.

her betrothal in 1444, and for the youthful Queen's reception in England and entry into London.¹ It is to be noted that in this narrative there is no suggestion of hostility to Suffolk and his policy. The Chronicle ends with a record of the French embassy to treat 'for a final peace' in 1445. Both for Eleanor Cobham and for Margaret of Anjou Dr. Brie's chronicle includes some matter not found in Stow's manuscript. Other passages of interest are the accounts of the combat of John Ashley with Sir Philip le Beef, a knight of Aragon, in 1442,² and of the burning of St. Paul's steeple in 1445.³ These last two passages, together with some smaller stories, were made use of by Stow in the later editions of his *Survey of London*⁴ in 1603, and of his *Annales*⁵ in 1605.

IV. THE SHORT VERSION OF 1446

This version is for the most part very brief, and is no more than an abbreviation from a copy of the previous version, with the omission of almost all that was of peculiar interest. The version has not, however, been preserved in its original form. The oldest extant fragment is the narrative for 1417 to 1420, which seems to have been interpolated on a blank leaf in C.⁶ Harley Roll C 8 dates from 1462, and S. (Lambeth 306) from 1465. Julius B i and Gough⁷ are much later. All the copies show frequent textual variations. In the account of the expedition into Flanders in 1436, the Harley Roll and Julius B i most nearly resemble the original in Dr. Brie's F.

V. THE CONTINUATIONS OF S.

These are of more interest and importance than the abbreviated Chronicle to which they are attached. The three copies—S., Harley Roll C 8, and Julius B i—between 1447 and 1460 clearly come from the same source or sources. The variations in their texts indicate the probability that they depend on more than one intervening copy. Possibly one such copy ended at 1448, for the three extant versions agree in having no notice for 1448-9. Under 1449-50 S. has an

¹ Brut, pp. 485-6, 488-9.

² Id. p. 482.

³ Id. p. 487.

⁴ i. 37, 97, 326; ii. 32, 70, 71, 75, 76.

⁵ pp. 592-3, 627, 630, 633, ed. 1605; pp. 361, 383-4, ed. 1631.

⁶ See p. 89 above.

⁷ See Flenley, p. 77.

excellent and indispensable account of Jack Cade's rebellion, where the other two manuscripts agree in a much shorter description. From 1451 to 1458 the Chronicle is brief; but the three copies appear to be derived from the same source, though with considerable textual variation, especially under 1454-5. From 1458 to 1462 S. and the Roll resemble one another in a narrative which is much longer and better than that of Julius B i. The Roll, though it is the older manuscript (it ends in February 1462), is the inferior. S. continues with a somewhat brief narrative to 1465. Apart from the account of Cade's rebellion the history of the two years 1458-60 in S. is the most valuable. For the last five years—1461-5—the Chronicle, though brief, has some useful details. Like all the London Chronicles of the time it is definitely Yorkist.

The Chronicle for 1446-52 in Arundel 19 is best put in this class. The scribe seems to have used the same Short Version of 1446 for his short entries from 1433 to 1446. He has a similar notice for 1446-7, and, like the copies just described, has none for 1448-9. But his narrative for 1449-52 would appear to represent one of the original sources of the Main City Chronicle. The notice for 1451-2 is made particularly valuable by its precise chronology.¹

VI. MISCELLANEOUS CHRONICLES, 1440-85

These have nothing in common, and are only grouped together for convenience.

(a) Robert Bale's Chronicle (1440-61).

Robert Bale is described by John Bale (d. 1563), who owned the manuscript (Trinity College, Dublin, E 5. 9), as a native of London, a lawyer, and a judge; Tanner adds incorrectly that he was Recorder of London.² Nothing is really known about him; but his Chronicle is a valuable and contemporary original, though it shows a Yorkist bias and a partiality for Warwick the King-maker. As far as 1440 Robert Bale followed the version of that year, whilst for 1440 to 1442 he used the older narrative of H. and C. From 1442 onwards his Chronicle is an original work except for some possible indebtedness to the Main City Chronicle at the start. It is throughout valuable for the illustration which it affords of the disordered state of England in the latter part of the reign of Henry VI. Still, its value consists rather in small details and in its presentment of contemporary opinion than in anything of distinct novelty. But the history of 1449 to 1451 is noteworthy, and useful for its precise chronology.

¹ See pp. 297-8 below.

² Cf. Flenley, pp. 68-70.

(b) Gregory's Chronicle (1440-70).

The early part of G. down to 1440 has been already described.¹ The whole Chronicle, which comes from Egerton MS. 1995 in the British Museum, is written in the same hand, the later continuation ending abruptly in 1470. For the last thirty years it is the best of the London Chronicles, and is one of the most valuable authorities which we possess at all. It owes its name of Gregory's Chronicle to the entry under 1451-2, when William Gregory was mayor, of a note of 'the greatest pardon that ever came to England from the Conquest unto this time of my year, being mayor of London'.² Since Gregory died in 1467,³ he cannot possibly have been the author of the whole Chronicle as it now stands. The Chronicle falls into three sections, (1) for 1440-51, (2) 1451-3, and (3) 1454-70. The first section, though it contains some peculiar matter, is not without points of resemblance to other London Chronicles. The account of Cade's rebellion is, however, remarkable as based on personal knowledge. Up to 1451 the names of the civic officers are properly given, but from that year onwards the entries are careless, and some names are omitted altogether. The notice for 1451-2 contains nothing but the account of the pardon, and that for 1452-3 is merely a retrospect of a year that was 'competent well and peaceable for any rising among ourselves'; the names of the mayor and sheriffs for 1453-4 are given, but those for the next year are omitted; there is no notice for 1453-4, and the notice for 1454-5 is entered as if it belonged to the mayor of the previous year; this error has made the chronology from 1453 to 1460 faulty. It is possible, though not very likely, that Gregory may have been the author of the Chronicle from 1440 to 1451; if he were the author of such a work, it would be strange that he should have omitted everything of importance in the year of his own mayoralty. It would be more reasonable that the two curious notices for 1451-3 should have been added by Gregory as personal notes at the end of his copy of the Chronicle.¹ The omission of any notice for 1453-4 points to a break at that date. The remainder of the Chronicle seems to be the work of a single writer, and cannot therefore be Gregory's.

¹ See pp. 90, 91 above.

² Collections of a London Citizen, p. 197.

³ Id., Preface, pp. iv, xlii.

Of the later portion of the Chronicle Dr. Gairdner writes: ² 'It is clear that during the remainder of Henry VI's reign, or at least till the last year of it, the continuator does not chronicle the facts so immediately after their occurrence as Gregory did before he was mayor.' That the account of the last years of Henry VI was not absolutely contemporary is conjectural only, but the date of the composition of the concluding portion from 1461 onwards can be proved on the evidence of incidental allusions. Under 1461 the writer states that Dr. Morton 'schapyd a way longe tyme after, and ys by yonde the see with the quene'; this points conclusively to the entry having been written after April 1463, when Margaret began her long exile, and before the restoration of Henry VI in the autumn of 1470, when Morton returned. A similar conclusion may be drawn from the reference, under 1465-6, in the present tense to Henry Parker, who died in 1470, and from the statement under the same year, that John Milverton had been released from San Angelo, but was still detained at Rome. Milverton was released in 1468; consequently the Chronicle, as it now stands, must have been composed not earlier than that year, nor later than the summer of 1470.³ The Chronicle ends abruptly in the spring of 1470; something has certainly been lost, but probably not more than a leaf or two.

Whether Gregory's Chronicle from 1440 to 1470 is the work of more than one hand or not, it is marked throughout by a curiously personal note, though mostly in the concluding portion, the writer of which, as Professor Oman¹ observes, had a strong sense of humour and a merry wit. 'Meat and drink was dear enough as though it had been in the land of war, for a shoulder of mutton was sold for 12*d.*; and as for bedding, Lyard my horse had more ease than some good yeomen; for my horse stood in the house, and the yeomen sometimes lay without in the street; for less than 4*d.* a man should not have a bed a night. Lo, how soon they could play the niggards!' ²

¹ See Kriehn's English Rising of 1450, pp. 10-15, for an argument against Gregory's authorship. Dr. Kriehn suggests that the entry for 1451-2 may be due to some other mayor; this seems superfluous.

² Collections of a London Citizen, p. xxiii.

³ Id. pp. 218, 228, 232.

In the first part of Gregory's Chronicle, save for the expression of some personal and popular criticisms, there is nothing of great importance for its novelty except the account of Jack Cade's rebellion, which Dr. Gairdner describes as 'certainly of no small value'.³ It is very much longer than the account in S., and contains matter not to be found elsewhere. In the latter part of the reign of Henry VI, Dr. Gairdner notes that 'great events are but slightly mentioned for the most part, and a good deal of space is devoted to occurrences of no great political interest'.⁴ There is, however, some good matter, of which the most noteworthy is the story of Queen Margaret's adventures between the battles of Northampton and Wakefield.⁵ For the first ten years of the reign of Edward IV there is much of value, and much that is not to be found in other writers. The interest is not confined to political events, and there are useful contributions both to civic and religious history. But Dr. Gairdner has dealt at length in his Introduction with the contents of the Chronicle, and there is no need to go over the ground again. The writer was clearly a London citizen, whose feelings are shown in his comment on the knighting of five aldermen by Edward IV: 'It is a great worship to all the city.'⁶ His personality adds very materially to the value and interest of his narrative, even where he writes of things which cannot have come under his own notice.

(c) A Short Chronicle (1461-83).

Of the conclusion of Julius B i, which covers the whole reign of Edward IV, little need be said. It is very brief, and

¹ Political History of England, iv. 503.

² Collections of a London Citizen, p. 238.

³ Id. p. xxiii.

⁴ Id. pp. 208-10.

⁵ Id. p. xx.

⁶ Id. p. 228.

the little which does not appear elsewhere relates chiefly to incidents of civic history. Probably it is an abbreviation of some longer Chronicle. It was of course compiled after the death of Edward IV; but from the interpolation in the notice of the birth of Elizabeth of York, of the words 'after quene and married to Kyng Henry the vii^{te}'¹ it may be conjectured that its date is earlier than 1486.

VII. THE MAIN CITY CHRONICLE, 1440-85

We here have to deal with a Chronicle which was not the work of a single writer, but like the versions of 1430 and 1440 was a redaction of a number of earlier Chronicles. Of its completed form we have three copies, viz., The Great Chronicle, the Second Chronicle of Vitellius A xvi (=V.), and Robert Fabyan's Chronicle. In the former two the narrative to 1485 forms part of a later Chronicle ending in 1496. Fabyan's own work ended originally with 1485. To that point all three copies come no doubt from a common source, though they now show very considerable variations. This common source is to be traced in other earlier works, and had itself gone through several editions. In the Introduction to the *Chronicles of London*² I suggested on internal evidence that the Vitellius Chronicle for 1440 to 1485 consisted of two portions, (1) 1440-74, being itself a compilation from earlier sources, and (2) 1474-85, the completed Chronicle, of which Fabyan made use, probably compiled soon after the end of the reign of Richard III. The Main City Chronicle was, however, also the source of the version of the Brut known as Caxton's Chronicles, which ends with 1461, and as will be shown in the next chapter was probably compiled between 1464 and 1470. Caxton's Chronicles, The Great Chronicle, and the Vitellius Chronicle agree on two points which are useful for determining the common original of their earlier portion. Under 1453 the latter two describe the establishment of the mayor's procession to Westminster by water as 'well-allowed';³ the first records it as 'never used afore, but sith that time they have gone ever by water'.⁴ Under 1457 all three record the

¹ Nicolas, p. 143.

² p. xvii.

³ Chronicles of London, p. 164.

⁴ Brut, p. 521.

invention of printing.¹ Neither of these notices could in their existing form be quite contemporary. Both are probably due to a version of the City Chronicle ending in 1461 and compiled a few years later. The same two notices help to fix an earlier copy. The Latin Chronicle of Rawlinson, B 355, which ends with 1460, states that by the establishment of the water-procession 'the honourable riding of the citizens of London was destroyed',² and does not notice the invention of printing at all. Thus we can distinguish two versions of the City Chronicle, both written soon after 1461, according to the character of the notices for 1453 and 1457. It is not so easy to fix dates for earlier copies, but a comparison of those which exist suggests that 1450 or 1451 was a probable date for one of the original sources; Arundel 19 shows more clearly that one ended in 1452.³ In all likelihood numerous copies were written between 1440 and 1485, each following for its principal source a text of established authority, but with variations to suit its own occasion or purpose. Thus the compilation of the Main City Chronicle was the result of a long process, and the dates suggested, 1450, 1452, 1461, 1474, and 1485, mark only some of the stages in its evolution.

The Great Chronicle must now be accepted as the best representative of the Main City Chronicle. For 1440 to 1450 it is better, more homogeneous, and fuller than V. The account of Cade's rebellion is similar, and the two copies agree closely down to 1460.⁴ For 1460-1 it seems to have the same original, but is much fuller than V. For the reign of Edward IV it furnishes us with a new authority of much value; it contains a great deal which is not to be found either in V. or in Fabyan, and though Stow borrowed from it the material which has given his Annales their distinctive importance for this reign, he did not exhaust its usefulness. For the reigns of Edward V and Richard III The Great Chronicle is of peculiar interest. It clearly preserves the best form of the narrative which is given in V, and by

¹ Brut, p. 524; Chronicles of London, p. 167.

² Flenley, p. 108.

³ See p. 95 above.

⁴ Both have the corrupt reading 'Duke of Glowcetur' in 1453-4; cf. Chronicles of London, p. 164.

Fabyan, and is fuller than either of them, though with some errors of chronology; it is perhaps a little more coloured by Tudor prejudices. It is stated that Stanley would have been executed at the same time as Hastings, but for fear of his son, Lord Strange, who was in Lancashire. After Easter 1484 there was much whispering amongst the people that the King had put the children of Edward IV to death, poisoned his wife, and intended to marry his niece, 'which caused him to fall in great hatred.' This is obviously inaccurate in date,¹ and can only be accepted as a reproduction of current report by a Tudor chronicler. Even thus it is important as presenting the popular opinion, adverse to Richard III, which was current in the early years of Henry VII. The Chronicle which ended with 1485 was probably written not more than a few years later. But we do not possess it in its original shape. In The Great Chronicle and in V. it forms part of a Chronicle which ends in 1496, whilst Fabyan's Chronicle was, according to his own account, completed in 1504. Nevertheless a comparison of the three versions points to the continuation from 1485 to 1496 being the work of a later hand, and indicates that the Chronicle which ends in 1485 was written some time before 1496. The continuation of The Great Chronicle beyond 1485, though it falls outside our period, calls for brief notice. The whole narrative from 1440 to 1496 is written in one hand, which has added a list of mayors to Henry Kebyll or Keble in 1510. Another hand—the third in the MS.—then added a Chronicle from 1496 to the autumn of 1513. As far as 1502–3 it is a superior copy of the Chronicles for 1485–1503 in V. The final continuation is a narrative of great value. Stow quoted much from it as 'Fabian's MS.', but it was clearly not written by Fabyan since it ends some months after his death. It does not seem to have any connexion with the brief continuations of V. and the printed Fabyan.

The Second Chronicle of Vitellius A xvi resembles the previous copy in covering the whole period from 1440 to 1496.

¹ Anne Neville did not die till March 1485, but in her lifetime there were shameful rumours of Richard's intentions.

The earlier portion from 1440 to 1450 is brief, and marred by repetitions and errors of chronology, which seem to point to its derivation from more than one source.¹ In 1450 we come to a long and valuable account of Jack Cade's rebellion, which through the medium of the substantially identical narrative of Fabyan is the source of the most popular version of the incidents of the year.² This narrative must, however, be supplemented from the different accounts of S. and G. After 1450 the Vitellius Chronicle is fairly full, though it does not add anything to Fabyan of such value as the history of the reign of Edward IV in The Great Chronicle. Most of the new material relates to small details before 1472.³ Of more importance are the narrative for 1454-6 (where it agrees with The Great Chronicle, but differs from Fabyan, who here followed some other source), and the accounts of the reception of Edward IV in London in 1461, and of the Lancastrian restoration in 1470 (for which it is, however, inferior to The Great Chronicle). The account of the latter part of the reign of Edward IV is very short, and between 1470 and 1475 there are some errors of chronology. The account of the reigns of Edward V and Richard III, whilst derived from the same source as that of The Great Chronicle, is not nearly so complete. Here, as in the subsequent continuations to 1503, the original is best preserved in that work.

The minor Chronicles which I have put in this class are of interest for the light which they throw on the early history of the Main City Chronicle. The Chronicle in Rawlinson B 355 is peculiar as written in Latin, but was no doubt translated from an English original. From 1440 to 1450 it is free from the errors of chronology which disfigure V., and contains a little fresh matter, in part of which it resembles Fabyan. The narrative for 1450-1 is peculiar, and so also is that for 1452-3. For 1454-5 it resembles Fabyan, but for the next year follows the original of V., but with some additional matter. For 1456-9 it resembles V., but again with additions. It ends in 1460, and probably represents a copy compiled soon after. As in so many other instances, this Chronicle is most useful for its later years, where the notices of riots in London are of special interest.¹

¹ See Chronicles of London, p. xvi. Since William of Worcester's Annales (see p. 163 below) have similar defects this faulty original must be as early as 1468.

² Cf. 2 Henry VI, Act iv.

³ See Chronicles of London, pp. xxxii, 313-20.

Gough, London, 10 follows the Short Version of 1446 with some variations to 1440. From 1440 to 1450 it is very brief; after 1450 it is closely related to V., and occasionally supplies some additional detail, especially in more exact dates. The most distinctive passage is the account of the accession of Edward IV. The main narrative ends abruptly in 1470. A fragment for 1495 resembles the Chronicle in V., but has some superior features. Gough is remarkable as containing some indications of its authorship. There are entries in the volume which suggest that the compiler was Chamberlain of the City and a member of the Goldsmiths' Company. Under Edward IV two Goldsmiths were successively Chamberlain, William Philip from 1474 to 1479, and Miles Adys from 1479 to 1484. A reference to 'Letter-book L' with the date 1483 points to Adys as the more likely.² In any case it is evident that the principal chronicle in Gough was compiled late in the reign of Edward IV, but it probably preserves material from one of the early copies of the Main City Chronicle, though its peculiarities may be due in part to the exceptional circumstances of its compilation by a high official of the City, and not by a professional writer.

The Chronicle of Robert Fabyan is to be treated naturally as one of the London Chronicles. He himself styled his work 'The Concordance of Chronicles', but when it was printed by Richard Pynson in 1516 it appeared with the title of The new Chronicles of England and of France. In Pynson's edition it ends with the reign of Richard III, and this probably represents the work as Fabyan left it, though with the omission of an autobiographical note and some verses of a religious character which form the 'Envoi' of his History.³ The note and verses were printed in Rastell's edition of 1533, together with continuations down to 1509. Fabyan himself in the note in question says: ¹ 'And here I make an ende of the vij parte and hole werke, the vij day of Nouembre in the yere of our Lord Jesu Christes Incarnacion, M vC. and iiij, . . . and thus endeth the seuenth parte.'

¹ Flenley, pp. 62-6; see p. 112 below.

² Flenley, pp. 75-6.

³ The manuscript copy in Cotton. Nero C xi ends in 1485, but gives the 'Envoi'. Another manuscript (apparently contemporary) in the possession of the Earl of Leicester ends at the same date. (Hist MSS. Comm. 9th Report, p. 354.)

The conclusion seems to be obvious that in 1504 Fabyan did not contemplate any extension of his Chronicles beyond 1485. Stow, however, states that Fabyan 'wrote a chronicle of London, England, and of France, beginning at the creation and endynge in the third of Henry the 8, which both I have in written hand'.² Dr. Busch³ suggested that Stow must by speaking of 'both' have intended to distinguish the 'Chronicle of London' and the 'Chronicles of England and of France'. This suggestion is no doubt correct; the 'Chronicle of London' is clearly The Great Chronicle, which Stow often cites as 'Fabian's MS.'; the 'Chronicles of England and of France' is of course the printed work, and Stow's MS. may probably be identified with Cotton. Nero C xi.⁴ It may be that Stow had some reason for connecting the former with Fabyan, but he was certainly in error if he intended to imply that Fabyan was the author of any part of it. The first two continuations ending in 1496 and 1503 were probably composed before Fabyan 'made an end of his whole work'; for this reason alone they are not likely to have been written by him. The internal evidence of the first and the literary quality of the second point to the same conclusion. The two continuations do not seem to be the work of the same hand; both in 'Fabian's MS.' and in Vitellius A xvi we have only copies, and not the original.⁵ Still less could Fabyan have been the author of the third continuation which ends in the autumn of 1513, some months after his death on February 28 of that year. The continuation printed by Rastell is merely an independent abbreviation of the original of the Vitellius continuations.

It has been useful to dissociate Fabyan's Chronicle from the

¹ Chronicle, p. 681.

² Survey of London, ii. 305-6.

³ England under the Tudors, i. 410.

⁴ There appear to be notes of his on ff. 52, 55, 56.

⁵ See Chronicles of London, pp. xxix, xxx. I of course abandon the suggestion that Fabyan had written any continuation at all. The quotations in Hakluyt prove to come from 'Fabian's MS.', the variations from the text of the Vitellius Chronicle being due to the writer of the third continuation.

later continuations, because by so doing we strengthen the case for believing that there was a version of the Main City Chronicle ending in 1485. Such a version was clearly a principal source of Fabyan's Chronicle. Fabyan himself makes no pretence of originality, stating expressly that his work was 'gathered with small understanding'. His Chronicle is little more than an industrious compilation, stringing together the accounts of older authorities without any attempt to harmonize them and with little critical capacity. For the French part of his History he followed chiefly the Compendium super Francorum Gestis of Robert Gaguin, which was printed at Paris in 1497¹. His English history of the fifteenth century is taken from one or more of the older Chronicles of London. His original must have contained the full version of 1430, with the continuations of 1432 and 1440, and the Main City Chronicle to 1485. This agrees broadly with The Great Chronicle. But that copy cannot be his sole original; he has a different text for the Lollards' Bill, and has some peculiar variations for Lydgate's verses (these latter may be of his own making) and a different notice for 1454-6, whilst for the reign of Edward IV his narrative (though better than that in V.) is so inferior to The Great Chronicle as to make it doubtful whether he had used that work at all. Moreover Fabyan on one occasion quotes an earlier London Chronicle specifically, when he states that the prisoners taken at Agincourt amounted to the 'number of twenty-four hundred and above, as witnesseth the book of Mayors';² no such statement appears in The Great Chronicle, or in any other of the extant copies of the London Chronicles. After 1440 Fabyan's Chronicle has some occasional additions which are found in the Brut, but not in the normal City Chronicle, and some small interpolations, personal to himself, which become more frequent as he approaches his own time, and relate chiefly to events in London.³ It must be added that he has sometimes imparted a touch of Lancastrian sympathy which did not appear in his original. From a comparison with the Vitellius Chronicle it seemed possible that Fabyan had added something from his own knowledge to the account of the usurpation of Richard III; but this is disposed of by the discovery of the still fuller account in The Great Chronicle. If Fabyan's Chronicle is thus entirely superseded as an original authority, his work has a permanent literary interest as the chief medium through which the Chronicles of London were quoted by later writers during more than three centuries.

¹ For a French Chronicle used by Fabyan see Sharpe, Calendar of Letter-book A, p. iii. n.

² Chronicle, p. 580.

³ Id. pp. 619, 624, 628, 633, 639, 654; cf. Chronicles of London, pp. 313-20.

The Main City Chronicle was no doubt a popular work at the end of the fifteenth and beginning of the sixteenth centuries. Traces of its influence are to be found in other places such as the brief London Chronicle of Richard Arnold, and the late Greyfriars Chronicle,¹ which was compiled in 1556. Arnold's work is mainly a commonplace book dealing with London antiquities. It was first printed in 1502, and reprinted in 1811 under the title of The Customs of London. It includes a Chronicle of little value, but greater interest attaches to the full text of the Articles and Arbitrament between Gloucester and Beaufort in 1426, and of the charges brought by Gloucester against his uncle in 1440.² The former certainly come from the London Chronicles; the latter may do so also, since there is a reference to them in one copy.³ Arnold's Chronicle furnished the base for the earlier part of a London Chronicle in Tanner MS. 2 in the Bodleian Library. This latter Chronicle, which extends to 1524, contains a few things of interest as giving Tudor opinion, such as the references to the secret murder of Henry VI, and to the death of the little Princes in the Tower.⁴

The history of the London Chronicles of the fifteenth century cannot be completed without an account of John Stow's use of them. He owned, and after his manner annotated, at least four of the extant copies,⁵ and in his Collections⁶ has preserved fragments of others. Further, in his Summary of English

¹ Monumenta Franciscana, ii. 161-80; these twenty pages are all that belong to our period.

² Customs of London, pp. 279-86.

³ Chronicles of London, p. 153.

⁴ Flenley, pp. 166-70.

⁵ The Great Chronicle; Cotton. MS. Vitellius A xvi; The Short English Chronicle (= Lambeth 306); and Harley Roll C 8; he had also used Harley 3775, though there is no evidence that he owned it.

⁶ Especially in Harley 540 (see pp. 92, 93 and 108); in Harley 541 there is a list of Mayors with a few notes (cf. Chronicles of London, p. 321), and in Harley 543 extracts from a Chronicle of the type of Julius B i.

*Chronicles*¹ he quotes frequently a work which he styles the 'Register of Mayors'. These quotations range from 1410 to 1464. Most of the earlier ones seem to come from a copy of type of H., but are occasionally fuller. Under 1452 is quoted a notice of the knighting of Henry VI's half-brothers; this appears in William of Worcester's Annales,² but not in the English Chronicles. Under 1457 there is a longer account of how Thomas Percy and his brother broke out of Newgate. The last notice from the 'Register of Mayors' is for the Sergeants' Feast in 1464, which is also given in the Survey of London; ³ it differs from the story in Gregory's Chronicle.⁴ But the most interesting of them all is the first, which also appears in the Survey.⁵ This is the story of the great debate of the king's sons, Thomas and John, at supper in Eastcheap in 1410, which led to the Mayor and Sheriffs being called to answer before the Chief Justice, William Gascoigne. In the ordinary London Chronicles⁶ there is only a brief reference to the 'hurling in Eastcheap'. Stow's story shows that the Chronicles had originally a longer story, and is further of interest for the introduction of Gascoigne. The story of the Prince and the Chief Justice clearly belongs to the cycle of City Legends about Henry V, and it is not impossible that Sir Thomas Elyot, who first gave it in his Boke called the Governour, may have borrowed it from a London Chronicle.

The discovery of The Great Chronicle has revealed the source of much valuable material in Stow's historical works, especially for the reign of Edward IV. Stow also made frequent use of the other copies which were in his possession. It is not always easy to trace the sources of his information, and for events about London he may have derived some material from a lost City Chronicle. As already noted, his own early histories were written on the model of the old Chronicles of London.

In conclusion I will discuss briefly the sources and historical value of the Chronicles of London. In the second chapter

¹ Ed. 1575, pp. 339, 345-6, 375, 383.

² p. [770].

³ ii. 36.

⁴ p. 222.

⁵ i. 217; Stow's narrative was followed very closely by the author of The Famous Victories of Henry V. Shakespeare only used it incidentally. See First English Life of Henry V, pp. xlviii, li.

⁶ Chronicles of London, p. 341.

I pointed out that some of the Latin Chronicles for the reign of Henry IV appear to have a common original with the English Chronicles of London.¹ Whether that original, which is now most fully preserved in the Brut, was itself a City Chronicle is not absolutely clear; but it was certainly the work of a Londoner. From the beginning of the reign of Henry V onwards the London Chronicles were assuredly an original compilation, which was in constant process of being written up and revised. Where they show points of resemblance to other works, as to the anonymous St. Albans Annals,² to William of Worcester's Annales,³ and above all to the Brut, there can be no room for doubt as to the nature of the debt. Of their connexion with the Brut I shall have more to say in the next chapter.⁴

The London Chronicles bear every sign of having been written in the first instance contemporaneously with the events which they record. In some cases notes were probably made when anything of sufficient interest occurred; this was almost certainly the case in the Vitellius Chronicle for the reign of Henry VII, where the original seems to have been little altered by subsequent rehandling. In other cases the narrative for several years may have been written up by the compiler of a new copy; this appears to have been the method adopted in some of the earlier versions. It is probable that the owner of a copy often added at the end a record of his own. Such a theory will explain the curiously personal note of Gregory's Chronicle. A more positive instance is afforded by the London Chronicle for 1527 to 1555 in Harley MS. 540, which appears to be made up of two separate records entered by successive owners at the end of an older Chronicle.⁵ Events in or about London were no doubt described by the writers from their own knowledge. But there is much other matter, such as the incidents of the French war and the battles of the Roses, which must have had a different origin. Some of it may have been based on the hearsay reports of persons who had been present;⁶ but some other things were probably derived from news-letters, to which we find occasional reference.¹ Other material was derived from official or semi-official documents, as notably in the early part of the Cleopatra Chronicle; ² nearly all that is most valuable for general history in the Version of 1430 is of this character.³ Evidence of the use of official city documents is less frequent than might have been expected; there are some instances in the Version of 1445, and in the Gough MS., but these are Chronicles of an exceptional character. It is curious that in the early Chronicles there is little evidence that the writers had made use of the letters which Henry V and other high personages addressed to the Mayor and City;⁴ an instance in Arundel MS. 19 seems to stand alone.⁵ In the continuation for 1496-1503 we, however, find frequent reference to 'tydynges which came to the Mair'.⁶

¹ See pp. 26, 28 above. ² See p. 150 below. ³ See p. 163 below.

⁴ See pp. 121, 133 below. ⁵ Camden Miscellany, xii, p. v.

⁶ The accounts of the siege of Harfleur, and of the fighting at Crottoy in C. seem to give the impressions of an eyewitness. Chronicles of London, pp. 118, 119, 144.

The manner of the composition of the London Chronicles indicates the nature of their value as historical sources. That consists, as before observed, in the fact that they were in their origin strictly contemporary, and reflect the popular opinion of the time upon the events which they record. The opinion is of course the opinion of the Capital, and perhaps especially of the mercantile class. So in the earlier years of Henry VI the London Chronicles are commonly favourable to Humphrey of Gloucester, whilst for the later years and for the reign of Edward IV they are predominantly Yorkist. The narrative of the reign of Richard III is hostile to the usurper; this follows naturally on the fact that it was written in the following reign. The London Chronicles are therefore not free from prejudice. But, if used with due caution, they are of all the more value as a contemporary interpretation of history. If at times they leave us a sense of regret for lost opportunities, they nevertheless possess something of that personal element which makes 'Memoirs' so fruitful in side-lights on history. That they had a practical value in their own time is shown by the frequent record of prices, and by

¹ Cf. Gregory's Chronicle, p. 179—'as letters made mencyon'.

² See p. 89 above.

³ See p. 82 above.

⁴ See p. 217 below.

⁵ See p. 297 below.

⁶ Cf. Chronicles of London, p. xxiv.

the insertion of matters of commercial interest, such as the financial legislation of 1425 and 1428, and the regulations for foreign merchants in the Parliament of 1439.¹

In their form the London Chronicles are for the most part but rude and artless compilations. Nevertheless their popularity affords the strongest evidence for the growth of a widespread interest in history, and for the process by which English was displacing Latin as its natural medium. In the point of language alone, if we compare such passages as the older part of the Cleopatra Chronicle, or Julius B ii, with the conclusion of the Vitellius Chronicle, we can see how rapid the change had been; the former are markedly archaic, the latter presents hardly any difficulty to the most unfamiliar of readers. Quite apart from their own contents and style, the London Chronicles have a distinct interest for historical literature. They furnished the groundwork of the Brut, which was for nearly a century the most popular and widely read history of England. Whether directly or through the Brut they underlie the majority of the minor Chronicles of the fifteenth century;² between Walsingham and the continuator of the Croyland Chronicle there is hardly any writer, except Whethamstede, who was not in some degree indebted to them. In the sixteenth century extensive use was made of them by Hall, Stow, and Holinshed, both through the medium of Fabyan and through the older versions. Their consequent influence on the narratives of later historians is not to be lightly estimated. Through the use which Shakespeare³ made of the sixteenth-century historians the London Chronicles have had an abiding effect in the formation of popular opinion on the character of the fifteenth century. We may revise that opinion, but we cannot do so without giving due weight to the new material which has been brought to light in such accounts as that of the concluding portion of Gregory's Chronicle.

¹ Chronicles of London, pp. 153, 281, 285-7.

² See pp. 148, 150, 157, 159-61, 163, 177 below.

³ Instances of material in Shakespeare's plays which comes from the London Chronicles are Henry of Monmouth's riotous conduct in London, the Lollards' Bill, and Cade's rebellion. Cf. First English Life of Henry V, pp. l-liv.

It seems necessary here to add a brief note on the Town Chronicles which were compiled in other places more or less on the model of the Chronicles of London. Such chronicles were kept commonly in many English towns, consisting as a rule of lists of the municipal officers with occasional notices of events in local history or references to more important incidents in the life of the nation. The most striking instance is to be found at Bristol. Seyer, the historian of that city, says that he had seen as many as twenty civic chronicles of Bristol; most of these, but not all, were written within the last two hundred years (i.e. after 1600), but they are evidently derived from more ancient copies.¹ Seyer in his *Memorials of Bristol*² quotes a few passages of interest for our period from such sources.

The oldest and most important of the Bristol Chronicles is that contained in the Kalendar of Robert Ricart,³ who was town clerk from 1479 to 1503. From 1447 onwards this Chronicle contains a fair number of brief entries, of which the most valuable, though by no means all, relate to local affairs; the references to royal visits are worth notice. Ricart's Kalendar has at least the merit of being an original compilation. This is more than can be said of the Chronicle of William Adams, which Seyer describes as 'far the best'. Adams's Chronicle, which extends to 1639, has recently been printed,⁴ and so far as regards the fifteenth century proves for the most part to be derived from Fabyan. This seems to be a usual characteristic of those Town Chronicles which are more than mere lists. Such is the case with the Chronicle of King's Lynn, written at the end of the reign of Henry VIII, which down to 1541 depends on the third edition of Fabyan, which appeared in the following year. Its brief notices for 1477 to 1485 are consequently of little interest.⁵ The best of the Dublin Chronicles—1401 to 1576—also derives much of its material from Fabyan, or a copy of the Main City Chronicle of London.⁶

¹ Memorials of Bristol, Preface, pp. x, xi.

² Id. ii. 189.

³ Ricart's Kalendar, Camden Society, 2nd ser., 1872.

⁴ Adams's Chronicle of Bristol, published for the owner of the manuscript, Mr. F. F. Fox, in 1910. It becomes full and interesting with the reign of Elizabeth.

⁵ Flenley, Town Chronicles, pp. 30, 84, 85, 184-6.

⁶ Id. p. 33.

The late dates of the Lynn and Dublin Chronicles are characteristic of most of the extant Town Chronicles. The material in them for local history may be derived from more ancient copies ; but there seems little reason to suppose that much of wider interest has perished. If, however, the Chronicles of the lesser towns cannot compete with the Chronicles of London in historic interest, and are as a rule too late in date to be of importance for our purposes, there is enough evidence that the compilation of them was not unusual in the later years of the fifteenth and earlier years of the sixteenth centuries to illustrate the growing demand for some form of historical literature during that period.¹

¹ On the lesser Town Chronicles see Flenley, Town Chronicles, pp. 27-38, and Gross, Bibliography of Municipal History, pp. xxi-xxiv ; for a Canterbury Chronicle, 1448-1554 (list of Mayors with a few entries), see Royal Hist. MSS. Comm. 5th Report, p. 434.

ADDENDUM TO PAGE 102

A further fragment of the London Chronicle in Rawlinson B 355 has recently been discovered. It carries on the narrative from July 1459 to November 1460, and ends imperfectly. See English Historical Review, xxviii. 124-7, for January 1913.

CHAPTER V

THE BRUT

It will have been obvious from the previous chapters how important the Brut or English Chronicle is, if not for our actual history, yet certainly for a study of the sources of our history, during the fifteenth century. It was, as we have seen, very closely related to the London Chronicles, and underlies in a greater or less degree many even of the Latin Chronicles such as the Continuation of the Eulogium Historiarum, Giles's Chronicle, the St. Albans Annals, and the Lives of Henry V by Tito Livio and the Pseudo-Elmham. It was indeed the most popular and widely diffused history of the time, and for this reason alone should command careful attention. Not less is it necessary to consider it in reference to its influence on the subsequent writing of history in England. The Chronicles of England, which were printed by Caxton in 1480, were no more than a version of the Brut; and the Continuation of Trevisa's Polychronicon, which Caxton published in 1482, was derived by him from similar sources. So the Brut became the first of our printed histories, and has had an abiding influence on our historical literature. Polydore Vergil made use of it in his Anglica Historia. The 'Translator of Livius' consulted both Caxton's Polychronicon and the manuscript Chronicles. Hall, Stow, and Holinshed were all under a great debt, both direct and indirect, to the Brut.

It is somewhat surprising that the Brut should have received so little attention from modern historians. Neither Sir James Ramsay nor Professor Oman mentions the Brut or Caxton's Chronicles amongst his authorities at all; and the latter, when referring to the abbreviation of the Brut which is contained in the English Chronicle from 1377 to 1461, edited by the Rev J. S. Davies for the Camden Society, speaks of it as 'in its earlier parts a compilation of no value'.¹

¹ Political History of England, iv. 500.

I doubt whether 'compilation' is a good description of a work which even in the shortened form of Davies's Chronicle contributed more to the histories of other writers than it borrowed from them; and the earlier and longer versions of the Brut deserve still less to be dismissed as 'of no value'. Yet the explanation is not far to seek. Though many editions of the Polychronicon and of Caxton's Chronicles of England appeared between 1480 and 1530, both works have long been rare and wellnigh inaccessible. Blades, it is true, printed the Continuation of the Polychronicon in his *Life of Caxton*¹ more than forty years ago; but for a scholarly and complete text of the Brut we have had to wait till the publication of Dr. Brie's edition by the Early English Text Society in 1906-8. It is only through the authentic text and various versions given in Dr. Brie's volumes that we can trace the relation of the Brut to other Chronicles, and form any just opinion of its historical value as a primary source. Unfortunately Dr. Brie's Introduction, containing his own final criticism, has yet to appear. I am therefore at some disadvantage in forming a judgement, which to be authoritative should rest on an intimate personal acquaintance with the numerous manuscripts and the history of their development. A brief abstract of his Introduction with a critical account of the manuscripts was, however, published by Dr. Brie in Germany in 1905,² and from this I have derived much assistance.

The Brut, as its name implies, is a history of Britain from mythical times. It was written originally in French, in which language there are two versions; the longer of these, ending at 1333, was probably written by William Pakington, who was Treasurer to Edward the Black Prince. Towards the end of the fourteenth century it was translated into English, with a continuation to 1377.³ Sir E. M. Thompson, in the notes to his edition of the *Chronicle*⁴ of Geoffrey le Baker, has called attention to the value of the Brut for the history

¹ Vol. i, pp. 215-65.

² Geschichte und Quellen der mittellenglischen Prosachronik, 'the Brute of England'.

³ A later English version is attributed to John Mandeville, who was rector of Burnham Thorpe in 1435.

⁴ Chronicon Galfridi le Baker, p. 183.

of the reign of Edward III, where it often preserves material otherwise unknown.¹

With the earlier portions of the Brut we are not here concerned. Its interest for us begins with a continuation from 1377 to 1419, the manuscripts of which are more or less uniform in type though very varying in quality. Dr. Brie is of opinion that the whole continuation for forty-two years was written at one time; and though there is no manuscript which can be shown to be older than 1450, thinks that the date of composition, though certainly later than 1419, was nearer to that year than to 1450.² At a later point I will suggest some reasons why it seems probable that the date must be at least as early as 1430; and also for the existence of versions ending between 1415 and 1419.³ The version which ended in 1419 was soon followed by further continuations. Some of these, which I described in the previous chapter, are based directly on the London Chronicles, preserving with greater or less fidelity their civic character. Of the more set and artistic continuations the first ends in 1430; the second is that which was adopted by Caxton for his Chronicles of England, and extends to 1461. Besides these two main continuations Dr. Brie gives a number of peculiar passages from two other versions. The most numerous and important come from one which ends in 1436. The others, chiefly of a legendary character, are found in a unique copy which includes a brief continuation to 1475.

I will now turn to consider the historical interest of the Brut, beginning with that version which ends in 1419.⁴ In the earlier part for the reign of Henry IV, the first thing which strikes the reader is the close resemblance to the London Chronicles. But a careful comparison shows that the Brut preserves the fuller narrative, and that in the London Chronicles we have a rehandling of the original by later abbreviators. Probably that original was itself a London Chronicle, which was reduced into a consecutive narrative in the Brut. But whilst the extant Chronicles of London have best preserved the form, the substance is best expressed in the Brut. Although our copies are of late date, this latter work is to be accepted as in its foundation a contemporary authority for the reign of Henry IV. Much of the material is not of great importance, but the details are often useful. For the story of the differences of opinion and policy between the King and Prince in 1411-12¹ we here come nearest to the original, which we have traced in the London Chronicles, in Giles's Chronicle, and in Otterbourne. We have it, moreover, in a more accurate shape.

¹ On the early history of the Brut see Brie, Geschichte und Quellen, pp. 32-51. ² Geschichte und Quellen, p. 66. ³ See pp. 119, 133 below.

⁴ This account of the various versions is based on Dr. Brie's printed texts. But see further, pp. 132, 133, and 299-301 below.

With the French war in the reign of Henry V the Brut undergoes a change of character, and, as Dr. Brie observes, puts on a certain poetical style. I do not think that there can be any doubt that the narrative of the siege of Harfleur and the battle of Agincourt are based upon some current ballads of the time, whether those which have survived or others that have perished.² We need not regard this as detracting from the value of the Brut. Ballad-literature has its own use as representing popular opinion, and not uncommonly preserves details which are of interest for the illustration of more bald if more accurate prose. That is certainly the case in the present instance. The history from 1415 to 1418 is brief, but not without value; as I have pointed out in a previous chapter, it was made use of by Tito Livio.³ With the siege of Rouen we get back to a poetical original in John Page's rude verses, which are paraphrased in some copies, and given at more or less length in others.

Page's poem is of so much interest that we must allow it to detain us a little. The versions of the Brut which stop in 1419 contain only a prose paraphrase, and that an imperfect one. Caxton's Chronicles were also printed from a copy which had only the prose paraphrase. But other versions, and amongst them the continuation to 1430, give the first part of the poem in a fuller paraphrase and the last part in verse. An imperfect copy was first printed in Archaeologia in 1827,⁴ and the concluding portion was added from two

¹ Brut, pp. 371-2.

² See further, pp. 238, 239 below.

³ See p. 53 above.

⁴ Vol. xxi, 43-78, from Bodley MS. 124.

manuscripts of the *Brut*¹ by Sir F. Madden in the following year. The complete poem is found only in Egerton MS. 1995, whence it was edited for the Camden Society in 1876 by Dr. Gairdner in his Collections of a London Citizen. The text as given by Dr. Gairdner differs a good deal from the other versions; 'though, perhaps,' as its editor observes, 'it is a trifle less polished, it appears to be taken from the first draft of the poem, and is on this very account all the more interesting.'² The Egerton MS. alone gives the author's name in the concluding lines:³

With owtyn fabylle or fage
Thys processe made John Page,
All in raffe and not in ryme
By cause of space he had no tyme;
But whenne thys were ys at an ende,
And he have lyffe and space he wyll hit amende.

From the changes in the other versions he would seem to have performed his promise. Of John Page himself we know no more than his own statement:⁴

At that sege with the Kyng I lay.

This much we could have guessed in any case, for the whole poem is manifestly the work of an eyewitness. That he wrote soon after the siege seems obvious from the manner of his personal references, as in his description of the Duke of Clarence:⁵

Of pryncehode he may bere a floure;
and of Henry V:⁶

He ys a prince for to commende,
But fewe in londe suche we fynde.

I think we may safely assume that in this poem we have a narrative written at the latest within two years of the end of the siege. For all its rude versification it is the most authentic account which we possess. There is, it is true, in the earlier portion some confusion of chronology.⁷ But I do not understand why Professor Oman should dismiss it as

¹ Harley MSS. 753 and 2256; Archaeologia, xxii. 350-98.

² Collections of a London Citizen, p. x.

³ Id. p. 45.

⁴ Id. p. 1.

⁵ Id. p. 7.

⁶ Id. p. 25; cf. p. 27.

⁷ As on p. 12.

containing 'little accuracy of detail'.¹ I prefer the judgement of Dr. Gairdner:² 'No other contemporary writer states the facts with so much clearness, precision, minuteness, and graphic power. That the author's information was not only minute but on the whole exceedingly accurate, we have little reason to doubt. It abounds in details which are met with nowhere else.' I need only add that though his language is simple and unpretentious, Page shows a very real capacity for vivid narrative, and a genuine sense of pathos in his story of the sufferings of the hapless Rouennois. If the Brut had preserved nothing else of value, no historian could afford to despise it. Although the poem has only of late become familiar in its entirety, either the original or the paraphrase gave colour to all other English accounts, from those of John Strecche, Tito Livio, and the Pseudo-Elmham to those of Hall, Stow, and Holinshed.

From Page's poem we pass on to the prose part of the Continuation of the Brut, which ends in 1430. The first incident recorded is the trouble of Queen Joanna and her confessor, Friar Randolph. This I note because the reference to Randolph's death shows that even the beginning of this Continuation must be of later date than 1429.³ The main source of the Continuation is no doubt a London Chronicle of the version of 1430; it often resembles Julius B ii and H., but like the London Chronicle of 1445 this copy of the Brut preserves traces of having been based on the fuller version of 1430.⁴ I think we may be justified in assuming that the whole of this Continuation in its present shape was originally compiled soon after that date. As compared with the regular London Chronicles it does not contain much that is entirely new, but has greater fullness of detail. It is particularly useful for the last years of Henry V, where the corresponding London Chronicles are weak. It is curious that it has no reference to the battle of Verneuil. The last event recorded is the capture of Joan of Arc; since there is no hint of her fate, the original is hardly likely to have been written after

¹ Political History of England, iv. 501.

² Collections, p. xi.

³ p. 423; cf. Chronicles of London, pp. 73, 298; Gregory's Chronicle, p. 164.

⁴ See p. 92 above.

1431. If I am right in this conjecture, the version of the Brut which ends in 1419 was probably first compiled a few years earlier. But it must be remembered that no extant manuscript of either version was written till considerably later; and also that the version of 1430 is not, even for the early part of the reign of Henry V, derived from the other version.¹

The second Continuation, which ends in 1461, was probably written all at one time. Throughout there are repeated allusions which show that the existing text was composed long after the events to which it relates. As early as 1431, in recording the election of Eugenius IV, there comes a reference to his death in 1447.² The papal notices, of which this is the first instance, are characteristic of the Chronicle; they seem to be derived from the Fasciculus Temporum of Caspar Rolewinck. The latest, which records the election of Pius II, marks the date of composition as after his death in August 1464.³ This is the earliest date at which the Chronicle as it stands can have been compiled. From the conclusion, which is a prayer for the happy fortune of Edward IV,⁴ it was, I conjecture, written before the Lancastrian Restoration of 1470. These dates are confirmed by the notice of Margaret of Anjou under 1445, where it is said that after the deposition of Henry VI she was 'fain to flee into Scotland, and from thence into France and Lorraine',⁵ without any reference to her subsequent return; again the time of writing would seem to be not earlier than 1464, and not so late as 1470. But though the Chronicle as a whole is thus a late compilation, it must be remembered that for the most part it is based on older and more strictly contemporary narratives. When, however, we meet with any statement for which confirmation cannot be found elsewhere, we must regard it with some doubt. This Continuation, as I mentioned above, is the one which was adopted by Caxton for his Chronicles of England, printed in 1480, and has passed commonly under his name; as Caxton's Chronicles it will still be convenient to refer to it.

¹ See pp. 132 and 299-301 below.

² Brut, p. 502.

³ p. 526; cf. Brie, Geschichte und Quellen, p. 114.

⁴ p. 533.

⁵ p. 512.

The earlier part of *Caxton's Chronicles*¹ resembles the copies of the version of 1419 in giving only a brief paraphrase of John Page's poem. The history from 1419 to 1430 is very much shorter than that of the previous Continuation. For the most part it is based on a London Chronicle of similar type, but with some details not found in the longer version of the Brut. There is also some new matter relating to Henry V, which seems to be of Westminster origin. We are given the King's dying words: 'Good Lord! Thou knowest that mine intent hath been, and yet is, if I might live, to re-edify the walls of Jerusalem.'² Also we are told that his tomb had 'a royal image of silver and gilt made at the cost of Queen Catherine'.³ Henry's tomb took long to complete, and the work on it was still in progress as late as 1438.⁴ There is a chapter, 'Of the Laud of King Henry the Fifth, and what he ordained for King Richard, and for himself after his death.'⁵ This contains a brief story of his change suddenly into a new man, and a record of the masses which he endowed at Westminster. Here also is found for the first time the story that the 'bishops and men of the spirituality doubted that he would have had the temporalities out of their hands: wherefore they encouraged the king to challenge Normandy, and his right in France, to the end to set him a work there, so that he should not seek occasions to enter into such matters'.⁶ Late in date though the Chronicle is, it shows that this story was not, as has often been alleged, an invention of the Protestant sympathies of sixteenth-century historians. It was, it is true, developed by Hall⁷ and Redmayne,⁸ with considerable embellishments, in part no doubt of their own devising, and assigned definitely to a debate in the Parliament of Leicester in 1414, with long and manifestly fictitious speeches by Archbishop Chichele, the Earl of Westmorland, and the Duke of Exeter. From Hall, through Holinshed,⁹ Shakespeare derived the first two famous scenes of his ¹ Cotton. Claudius MS. A viii, which has often been quoted by modern historians, is a copy of Caxton's Chronicles for the reign of Henry V.

² p. 493.

³ p. 494.

⁴ See Cal. Pat. Rolls, Henry VI, ii. 129, iii. 197.

⁵ pp. 494-6.

⁶ p. 495.

⁷ Chronicle, pp. 49-56.

⁸ Memorials of Henry V, pp. 24-30.

⁹ Chronicles, iii. 65-7.

Henry V. There is no trace of any such discussion at Leicester in contemporary authorities, and as a matter of fact Chichele was not then Archbishop, and Thomas Beaufort was not created Duke of Exeter till nearly three years later. If the story is an instance of the dangers of legendary and manufactured history, it is also a warning to us not to be too hasty in condemning as wholly false a narrative which has received indefensible embellishments.

The history of the early years of Henry VI in Caxton's Chronicles is brief. I will only touch one point. The battle of Verneuil is assigned apparently to the first year, 1423, instead of to 1424.¹ This is worth noting, because it illustrates how the Brut grew out of the London Chronicles. The London Chronicler put down the names of the mayor and sheriffs, and then began the record of each event 'This yere', &c. The compiler of the Brut omitted the names of mayor and sheriffs, but copied down the entries² often without any alteration to show the true date. We see the change in process in Dr. Brie's Appendix D, to the faulty chronology of which I directed attention in the previous chapter. However, the present instance is of value as showing how closely the compiler of Caxton's Chronicles reproduced his older original.

Caxton's Chronicles from 1431 to 1440 are, as before, derived from a London Chronicle, with, as before, some fresh details. From 1440 onwards they follow closely the Main City Chronicle, but with additional matter which shows that the writer had made use of one of the longer and better copies. For the events of 1440 to 1446 they are much superior to the Vitellius Chronicle, and are interesting for their adverse judgement on Suffolk's policy in promoting the marriage of Henry VI and Margaret of Anjou. 'Many men deem that the breaking of the King's promise to the sister of the Earl of Armagnac was cause of this great loss and adversity.'³ The comment is, of course, that of the Yorkist compiler of the time of Edward IV; but it was adopted by Hall⁴ and Holinshed,⁵

¹ p. 497.

² See p. 85 above; see also Note on p. 301 below.

³ p. 512.

⁴ Chronicle, p. 205.

⁵ iii. 208.

and through them inspires the last scene of 1 Henry VI and the first scene of 2 Henry VI.

It is noteworthy that Caxton's Chronicles contain most of the material which is to be found in Fabyan but not in the Vitellius Chronicle, and on the other hand omit certain things, like the assembly at Clerkenwell in 1461, which are peculiar to the Vitellius Chronicle.¹ In Caxton's printed text there is a gap which covers nearly the whole of 1458 and 1459, and even the text as given by Dr. Brie² lacks some important matter which appears both in Fabyan and in the Vitellius Chronicle. As might be expected from the time at which they were written, Caxton's Chronicles are Yorkist; favourable to Humphrey of Gloucester, and hostile to Suffolk and Margaret of Anjou. Henry VI is, however, called 'a good, simple and innocent man'.

I now turn back to the peculiar versions of the Brut given by Dr. Brie. The first of these, which ends in 1437, is in some respects the most important and valuable of all. It seems to represent in part the longer original of the English Chronicle from 1377 to 1461, edited by the Rev. J. S. Davies for the Camden Society, of which I shall have more to say presently. Even in the earlier portion before 1419 this version, of which the chief manuscript is Harley 53, contains some peculiar matter. Under Henry IV there is a curious story of a debate between the King and Hotspur.³ Percy demanded the payment that was due to him, 'for ne had he been, he had never been King of England.' The King in wrath struck Percy on the cheek. Then said Sir Henry: 'In faith this shall be the dearest bought buffet that ever was in England.' In a later version of the story, in Lambeth MS. 84, the quarrel is alleged to have begun with Percy's reproach of the King for breaking his promise not to claim the crown.⁴ It is given somewhat differently in Davies's Chronicle,⁵ where the King is said to have drawn his dagger on Percy; a similar tale is alluded to by Thomas Gascoigne in his Theological

¹ See Notes in Chronicles of London, pp. 315-17.

² pp. 524-7.

³ p. 548.

⁴ p. 593; cf. 1 Henry IV, iv. iii.

⁵ p. 27; so also Cont. Eulogii Historiarum, iii. 396.

Dictionary.¹ The story is no doubt legendary, and may point to the somewhat late date (1430-6) of the original of this part of this version. Of more serious importance is an account of the capture of Mark near Calais by John Beaufort in 1405, which seems to come from the same source as one in the Continuation of the Eulogium Historiarum, but is not given in Davies's Chronicle.² The narrative of Harley 53 for 1406 to 1413 is very similar in its general character to Davies's Chronicle, though with some omissions and one or two slight additions.³

For the reign of Henry V Harley 53 has a peculiar and interesting account of Oldcastle's rebellion,⁴ which was apparently used by Stow⁵ in combination with the London Chronicle in Harley MS. 3775. In other places these two versions of the Brut and of the London Chronicle show signs of relationship. The narrative of the campaign of 1415⁶ in Harley 53 is different from that of the other versions, and in its lists of the hostages at Harfleur, and of the French lords slain at Agincourt, resembles the Cleopatra Chronicle of London.⁷ It contains the statement that the archers were provided with stakes by the advice of the Duke of York. Stow⁸ gives the same story from the 'Translator of Livius'.

The narrative of Harley 53 for 1417 and 1418⁹ is not given by Dr. Brie. It is very similar to that of Davies's Chronicle,¹⁰ but has a few peculiarities. The execution of Oldcastle is wrongly placed before August 1417. The account of the siege

¹ Loci e Libro Veritatum, p. 230; Waurin borrowed it from this version of the Brut.

² Brut, p. 550; Eulogium, iii. 401. There is an independent version in Annales Henrici Quarti, p. 400.

³ This passage is not given by Dr. Brie. It omits the long account of Scrope's rebellion (but adds a miracle), and the first three notes on p. 35 of Davies's Chronicle. It adds a reference to the weirs on the Thames and Medway in 1405-6 (cf. Chron. Lond. p. 64), and another on the change of coinage in 1412 (id. p. 68; Brut, p. 372); it is a little fuller on the fight at St. Cloud, where it reads 'the lorde Bravile' instead of 'the lorde Hambe' (cf. Davies's Chron. p. 37). Henry IV is said to have been buried 'besides queene Johan his wif'; this cannot have been written till after August 1437.

⁴ Brut, p. 551; cf. Waurin, ii. 95-8.

⁵ Annales, p. 344.

⁶ Brut, pp. 553-7.

⁷ Chronicles of London, pp. 117-18, 122-3.

⁸ Annales, p. 349.

⁹ Harley MS. 53, ff. 157, 158.

¹⁰ pp. 44-8; it omits the references to the Council of Constance, and to Earl Douglas on p. 44.

of Caen is a little different, and records the death of Edmund Springge, 'a good squire and a manly man: wherfore the Kyng was hevvy and sory.' The account of the siege of Rouen is also different; Henry is said to have learnt of the distress in the city 'by a spy that come out of the town privily and went in again'. In these points Harley 53 differs both from Davies's Chronicle, and from the ordinary text. But in one or two places it approximates to the latter.

From the fall of Rouen to the end of the reign of Henry V Harley 53 is almost verbally identical with Davies's Chronicle.¹ It is a good deal shorter than the common version, especially in its narrative for the last year; at the same time it contains some additional matter. From 1422 to 1436 it is of more independent value; it differs from the main text of the Brut throughout, though down to 1434 there is only a little that is not to be found in the London Chronicles. There is, however, an unusually good and correctly-dated description of the battle of Verneuil,² which is no doubt the original of that in Caxton's Chronicles. Another point which deserves to be noticed is the definite statement that Cardinal Beaufort diverted his army of Crusaders to serve in France 'for the weal and the worship of all the realm of England'³; for this we are, I believe, otherwise dependent on documentary evidence.

In 1434 there begins a characteristic account of events at Calais, with a fuller history of the mutiny of the garrison in that year.⁴ After a notice of the Conference at Arras come stories of an insult to the English envoys as they returned through Popering, and of the despite which the Flemings showed to the English.⁵ There then follows a long and most interesting description of the siege of Calais in 1436.⁶ There is nothing to compare with it in English accounts, and the racy anecdotes with which it teems make it superior to the full narratives given by the French historians.⁷ It is manifestly the work of an eyewitness, proud of the gallant defence, and of the skill shown by his commanders, and not least by

¹ Brut, pp. 559-63; Davies's Chron. pp. 48-52.

² Brut, pp. 565-7.

³ p. 568.

⁴ p. 570.

⁵ pp. 571-2.

⁶ pp. 573-80.

⁷ As Waurin, iv. 150-99, and Monstrelet, v. 238-62.

Edmund Beaufort. The Harley MS. ends at the defeat of the Flemish on July 27. Another copy, in Lambeth MS. 6, carries on the history to the actual raising of the siege, and ends with a fine ballad in scorn of the Flemings, who with great pride and boast had laid siege to Calais, that little town.¹ It is curious that the narrative should not extend to cover Gloucester's raid into Flanders and vengeance on Popering in August. I think that any one who reads this Chronicle will agree with Dr. Brie² that it was written very soon after the last events recorded. For the siege of Calais this version of the Brut is of more original value than even the best of the London Chronicles.³

It should be noted that Harley 53 is a late copy of the Chronicle which it contains. From a royal genealogy⁴ which is prefixed to the text it would seem to have been written after the birth of Richard of Gloucester and before the birth of Edward, Prince of Wales, i.e. between October 1452 and October 1453. But the evidence of Davies's Chronicle and of the Latin Brut supports the conclusion that the narrative was originally composed in 1436 or 1437.⁵

The second of the peculiar versions of the Brut, which is found in a unique copy in Lambeth MS. 84, is of very late date, the direct narrative extending to 1475, with vague references for some years later. It seems to have been written in 1478-9, for a list of the children of Edward IV⁶ includes George, who was born in 1478 and died in March 1479, but not Catherine, who was born about the end of the latter year. Its Yorkist character is shown in the statement that when Henry IV was made king, Richard, Earl of Cambridge, was put aside;⁷ Richard and his future wife had of course at that time no sort of claim to the crown. An account of the murder and burial of Richard II contains the story of how he was killed by Sir Piers Exton.⁸ Under 1403

¹ pp. 581-4; the ballad was printed in Archaeologia, xxxiii. 129-32.

² Geschichte und Quellen, p. 109.

³ See p. 93 above.

⁴ On f. 11. On f. 13^v there are the arms: 'Silver, a chevron azure with three trefoils silver, within a border gules bezanty;' and the motto, 'Lans Deo honor et gloria'. These arms belong to the Stokes family.

⁵ See pp. 131 and 132 below.

⁶ p. 603. Richard is called Duke of York and of Norfolk; he received the latter title in February 1478.

⁷ p. 589.

⁸ pp. 590-2.

appears another version of the legend of Henry IV's quarrel with Hotspur.¹ But the most novel and interesting passage is a long story of Henry V's riotous youth and change when he became king.² It is stated that as Prince of Wales he 'intended greatly to riot and drew to wild company', but three men of his household were 'full heavy and sorry of his governance' and therefore he hated them most. When, however, Henry became king, he dismissed all his household with rich gifts, save for these three men; and sent to Catherine Swinford, his father's step-mother (who is wrongly styled Countess of Hereford³), for men that were of good disposition, and she sent him twelve gentlemen of sad governance. Catherine Swinford had been dead ten years, but Henry's own grandmother, the Countess of Hereford, was still alive. It is the most detailed fifteenth-century story of Henry's riots and conversion which we possess; but though it is pure legend, is as such interesting; it seems to come from the same source as Ormonde's story given by the 'Translator of Livius'. The same passage contains an anecdote of Henry's justice as king, in stopping the private warfare of two north-country lords; Hardyng⁴ here has a tale under date 1421 which seems to refer to the same incident. For the battle of Agincourt there is a peculiar narrative,⁵ with nothing very fresh. Under the siege of Rouen comes a unique legend of how an old prophecy was fulfilled, which told that the city should be taken by a king with thirty kings in his retinue.⁶ The history of Henry VI is brief and somewhat legendary, till we come to the siege of Calais. Even there the Chronicle shows its late and untrustworthy character, by making Thomas Beaufort take part in the siege, and by calling him brother of Humphrey of Gloucester. But in compensation we get another of the ballads which were made in despite of the Flemings.⁷ The history for 1455 to 1475, which is printed by Dr. Brie, though peculiar, is very brief and unimportant.⁸ It ends with a record of plagues and portents.

¹ p. 593.

² pp. 593-6.

³ Probably the original had simply 'Countess of Hereford', meaning Joan Bohun; Catherine Swinford died in 1403.

⁴ Chronicle, p. 383, ed. Ellis.

⁵ pp. 596-8.

⁶ p. 598.

⁷ pp. 599-601: see p. 241 below.

⁸ pp. 601-4.

The version of the Brut which was edited fifty years ago by the Rev. J. S. Davies as An English Chronicle from 1377 to 1461 presents some remarkable differences from those before described. Down to 1413, as explained above, it is closely related to the Continuation of the Eulogium Historiarum, and as far as 1401 the two works seem to have had a common Latin source which may have been of Canterbury origin. Even in this part Davies's Chronicle adds matter from the common versions of the Brut. But the appearance of the reference to the exhumation of Wiclif¹ shows that the English writer used, not the original Chronicle ending in 1401, but the recension made after 1428. From 1401 to 1413, and again from 1417 to 1422, Davies's Chronicle is certainly very closely related to the version of the Brut in Harley 53. I have already discussed sufficiently the relationship of the Chronicle to the Continuation and to the Harley MS.² It is enough to repeat here that the latter two agree in containing some things which are not found in the Chronicle; and that this last in its turn has some peculiar matter of its own, the most important instance being the long account of Archbishop Scrope's rebellion.³ All three works have a common original with the Latin Brut for the reign of Henry IV. For the first six years of the reign of Henry V Davies's Chronicle resembles the longer version of the Latin Brut, and from 1419 to 1437 their relationship is singularly close. An important point in this last resemblance is the story of the Earl of Douglas's

¹ On p. 6, under date 1384. See pp. 28-32 above. This is a difficult point. It is clear that the compiler of Davies's Chronicle had used a copy of the English Brut for the whole period from 1377 to 1413, and also that his work is during the same period closely related to the Continuation. On the other hand the verbal resemblances of the Continuation and the Southern Chronicle seem conclusive as to the existence of a Latin original ending in 1401. The Continuation cannot therefore be simply a translation from the English before that date, though it already shows traces of connexion with the Brut. But it is also fairly clear that the Continuation, Davies's Chronicle, and the version of the Brut in Harley 53 had a common English original between 1401 and 1413. I can only suggest that the Continuation and Davies's Chronicle were compiled independently, the writers of both making use in different ways of two versions, the one English and the other Latin, of an older Chronicle.

² See pp. 29, 30 and 123, 124 above.

³ Davies's Chron. pp. 31-4; the Latin Brut has some resemblance, see p. 314 below.

oath to Henry V in 1417, and of his subsequent death at Verneuil.¹ Herein we have proof that the common original of the Latin and English versions was not compiled till after 1424. Probably it was an English version of the Brut coming down to 1437; at all events some manuscripts of the English version of this type actually end, like the Latin Brut, in that year.² Tito Livio by quoting the story of Earl Douglas with reference to Verneuil proves that his original was written before 1437 or 1438. As before explained, Tito Livio followed very closely that version of the Latin Brut which is most nearly connected with Davies's Chronicle.³ In Davies's Chronicle itself we seem to have clear evidence that one original ended in 1437, since there is a gap from the death of James I of Scotland in that year to 1440. It must not be overlooked that this original of 1437 was a composite work made up from a number of older sources. Comparison with the Continuation of the Eulogium indicates that one source ended with 1401, and others possibly with 1406 and 1413. From comparison with the Latin Brut and Harley 53 we get signs of possible breaks at 1415 and 1417, and more certainly at 1419, where the closest relationship of Davies's Chronicle and Harley 53 begins, and at 1422, where it ends. The overlapping and interlacing of these Chronicles makes the history of their development a difficult problem. The most likely solution is that the Brut was not the homogeneous work of a single writer, but that various hands were at work on it during a number of years, selecting their material sometimes from one quarter and sometimes from another.

The concluding part of Davies's Chronicle covering the period from 1440 to 1461 differs altogether from the ordinary version of the Brut or Caxton's Chronicles. The history of Eleanor Cobham is, for instance, much fuller. The main source down to 1450 is, however, again a London Chronicle. The text as it stands was not written till after Eleanor Cobham's death,⁴ and probably, therefore, the whole Chronicle from 1440 to 1461 is in its present form the work of a single

¹ Davies' Chron. p. 44; see p. 330 below; the reference does not appear in Harley 53.

² Brie, Geschichte und Quellen, pp. 97, 99.

³ See p. 53 above.

⁴ Cf. p. 60.

hand. The really distinctive, fullest, and most important part is for the last eleven years, the history of which takes more space than that of the whole of the previous half-century. The detailed account of Jack Cade's rebellion¹ seems to be independent of any of the versions of the London Chronicles. From 1450 to 1457 there is not much of importance besides a fairly good account of the first battle of St. Albans,² and a lengthy notice of the trial of Reginald Pecock.³ For the last three years of Henry VI Davies's Chronicle is one of our most valuable authorities, incorporating copies of documents and a ballad which was set up on the gates of Canterbury in 1460.⁴ It ends with the election of Edward IV on March 3, 1461, and was probably written not much later. As may naturally be expected from the date of composition it is pronouncedly Yorkist, and particularly bitter against Margaret of Anjou. The manuscript belonged to John Stow, who took from it the account of Pecock's trial and abjuration, and most of his history for 1459 and 1460, including the documents. Afterwards it passed into the hands of John Speed, who used it in his History of England, and from whom it descended to its editor.

Mr. Davies in an Appendix to his Chronicle printed some extracts from a version of the Brut written by Richard Fox of St. Albans in 1448. The most important is an account of the Parliament of Bury and death of Duke Humphrey in 1447, which is of peculiar value as a strictly contemporary record.⁵

It is a somewhat remarkable illustration of the growing strength of the English language and of the wider interest in English History that the only continuous Chronicle of the early fifteenth century should have been composed in the popular speech; yet more that it should not only have furnished much material to those who still wrote in Latin, but also have itself been translated into Latin for the use of those to whom the ancient literary tradition still appealed. The Latin versions of the Brut are not uncommon,⁶ but they do not all cover the whole ground of the English original,

¹ pp. 64-8.

² pp. 71-2.

³ pp. 75-7.

⁴ See p. 246 below.

⁵ pp. 111-18.

⁶ See pp. 310-12 below.

and some copies extend no further than the Norman Conquest. I am here only concerned with those which reach the fifteenth century. Of these it appears to be a common characteristic that they should end with the death of James I of Scotland in 1437. With a notable exception, for the reign of Henry V, they all seem to be derived from the same English original. But whilst the manuscripts agree very closely in their matter and its arrangement, they present frequent textual variations, which often seem to be due to independent translations from the English. The common version, as will be seen from the text printed below, is very brief; it is indeed but a meagre abridgement, and it is its textual interest alone which makes it worth printing and study. For the reign of Henry IV the Latin Brut appears to be derived from the English original represented by Harley 53 and Davies's Chronicle. The relationship may be illustrated sufficiently by the references to the Prior of Launde, and to Sir William Plumpton, as a supporter of Archbishop Scrope,¹ and by the memorial verses on the battle of Shrewsbury.² For the reign of Henry V the earlier part of the common Latin Brut seems to follow the common English version. For the campaign of Agincourt some copies are extremely brief, whilst others have a fuller narrative. This latter narrative probably comes from the same source as that in Davies's Chronicle, which differs somewhat both from the common version and from Harley 53. From 1415 to 1422 the common Latin version is very brief. The short notes for 1416-17 are of the same origin as Davies's Chronicle. The remainder of the history of Henry V is peculiar, and does not seem to be derived from any existing English original. For the most part it consists of lists of sieges and of the persons who took part in them; one of these lists is found also in the abbreviation of the Pseudo-Elmham.³ The short notices of the siege of Rouen and the defeat of Clarence at Baugé may be taken from the common English version.⁴ The brief history from

¹ Davies's Chron. pp. 23, 33; Brut, p. 547; cf. p. 314 below.

² Brut, p. 549; cf. p. 314 below.

³ Gesta, pp. 143, 144; cf. p. 319 below.

⁴ Brut, pp. 391, 427; cf. pp. 318-20 below.

1422 to 1437 is only of interest for the circumstance that it comes from the same source as Davies's Chronicle; a few names are added in the account of Verneuil.

The exceptional version of the Latin Brut is of interest for the fact that we have in it one of the original sources made use of by Tito Livio,¹ who has reproduced the greater part of it with such verbal fidelity that it has no value except for literary history and textual comparison. The only considerable passage which Livio does not make use of is the earlier part of the campaign of Agincourt; in this place the exceptional version follows exactly the narrative of the superior copies of the common version.² Lest it might be suggested that Livio's Vita is the original and the Latin Brut the copy, I may point out that whilst it would be natural for Livio with the better sources at his disposal to give a different account of the French war, it is unlikely that the compiler of the Latin Brut, if he had had the Vita before him, would have omitted so much of the superior narrative, and in other places have substituted inferior material. Apart from this it is clear that this version of the Latin Brut comes from the same source as Davies's Chronicle. In the earlier years the resemblance is not always plain. But from 1416 onwards it is well marked, and after 1419 the Latin is virtually a translation of Davies's Chronicle.

As before observed, the versions of the Latin Brut are chiefly of textual or literary interest. Their most obvious value is for the light which they throw on the composition of Tito Livio's Vita and Davies's Chronicle, and as proving the existence of a version of the English Brut, which ended in 1437 and was compiled not long afterwards. But they also furnish some useful suggestions as to the earlier development of their English original. In the common Latin version there seems to be a break after 1415, when it ceases to resemble the longer version.³ This latter version comes from the same source as Davies's Chronicle for the events of 1416 and down to August 1417, but is almost barren for the next twelve months; the resemblance is resumed with the siege of Rouen, but becomes closest after the capture of that city.¹ The peculiar version in Harley 3884 also suggests the existence of originals ending in 1417 and 1419; after translating the common English version down to 1419, it goes back to the longer Latin version for a narrative beginning in August 1417.² A close examination of some of the English copies points to similar conclusions. The history of the first six years of the reign of Henry V in the version of 1430 is not derived from the version which ends in 1419. In the first chapter³—March 1413 to October 1416—the two versions come from the same sources; but the version of 1430 is on the whole the fuller, and contains some noteworthy additions, especially for the visit of Sigismund; it leaves one with the impression that it represents more faithfully the common original, which, to judge from one expression,—‘The King, the worthy prince, that God save and keep’—must have been written during the life of Henry V. In the second chapter—October 1416 to July (?) 1418—the variation of the two versions is much more marked; they agree very closely down to the landing in Normandy, but from this point the differences both of matter and form are so great, that though they are in part derived from the same sources they must assuredly have been composed independently.⁴ Neither version notices the siege of Falaise, and thus there is a gap in the narrative from November 1417 to July 1418. The third chapter in both versions gives a description of the siege of Rouen, based on John Page’s poem; but the version of 1430 gives a new and fuller rendering of the original, and preserves much of it intact.⁵ One manuscript—Harley 753—follows the common version nearly to the end of the second chapter, and then adds some matter from the version of 1430, which it also follows for the third chapter.⁶ This com-

¹ See p. 53 above.

² Compare the two passages on pp. 316-17 and 326-7 below.

³ Cf. pp. 317 and 326 below.

¹ Cf. pp. 329–31 below, and Davies’s Chron. pp. 42–6.

² See p. 342 below.

³ Brut, pp. 373–81.

⁴ Dr. Brie does not give either of these chapters of the version of 1430. Some passages from the first, and the whole of the second are printed in the Appendix to this volume (pp. 299–309), where their character and derivation are more fully discussed.

⁵ Cf. Brut, pp. 387–91 and 394–422.

⁶ See p. 302 below, where is also noted another instance of a composite copy.

parison of the two versions points to the possibility of earlier versions ; one perhaps ending in November 1415 or in October 1416,¹ and others more certainly in July 1417 and November 1417. The probability that one version may have ended in 1415 is supported by the peculiar narrative of the campaign of 1415 in Harley 53, which shows some resemblance to another peculiar narrative in the Cleopatra Chronicle of London.² With these considerations before us it does not seem possible to reject the probability of there having been earlier recensions of the English Brut than that great one which ended in 1419 at the fall of Rouen. At all events the existence of such divergencies proves that the development of the English Chronicle was not a homogeneous process ; but that, as in the case of the London Chronicles, different scribes made use of different originals, or used the same originals in different ways.

It will have been obvious throughout how closely the Brut is related to the London Chronicles. Nevertheless, it will be useful to recapitulate the points at which the two touch one another in the dates of their composition. Like the London Chronicles, the Brut seems to have undergone a process of gradual compilation between 1415 and 1430. There may have been early versions of the Brut ending at various dates between 1415 and 1419 ; but the evidence for this is not positive, and may merely indicate that some of its originals in the shape of City Chronicles ended at such dates. The version of the Brut which ends in 1419 has no exact parallel in a City Chronicle. But the more important version, which ends in 1430, coincides in date with an important version of the London Chronicle and was probably derived from it. The version of the Brut ending in 1437 stands by itself ; in its history of 1436 it is original and is not derived from any City Chronicle. It is curious that, though so many of the existing manuscripts of the Brut date from the next twenty years, there should have been a complete cessation of literary activity as regards any continuation of the narrative. In its final version ending with 1461 the Brut returned to the original source; though we have no direct proof of a copy of the Main City Chronicle which ended at that date, it is certain that early versions of that Chronicle were already in existence,¹ and that one of them was, with slight additions, adopted by the latest continuator of the Brut.

¹ Like the Gesta.

² Brut, 553-7 ; Chronicles of London, 118, 122.

Though the main narrative of the Brut was formed by a rehandling of the material contained in the London Chronicles, it must not be supposed that they represent its only source. Something of the additional matter may be due to the use of fuller copies of the London Chronicles. But other things were derived from such sources as ballads and popular poems, as in the case of Agincourt, the siege of Rouen, and the defence of Calais.² News-letters and reports of eyewitnesses were suggested as a probable source of some of the history given in the London Chronicles; the compilers of the Brut certainly made additions from similar sources, the most notable instances being the stories of the expedition of the Earl of March in 1417,³ and of the siege of Calais in 1436.⁴ The accounts of the campaign of 1415, and of Sigismund's visit to England are very probably based on contemporary records.⁵ Other material such as the account of the last days of Henry V in the version of 1430, and the still fuller account with 'The Lawde of Kyng Henry V' in Caxton's Chronicles,⁶ seem to come from other written narratives; the passage in Caxton's Chronicles, as before noted, is probably of Westminster origin. Something may also be due to floating tradition, such as the stories in Lambeth 84.⁷ But whatever its intermediate sources may be, it cannot be questioned that a great part of the Brut rests ultimately on the evidence of eyewitnesses. Confusion and mistakes have sometimes crept in through the ignorance or carelessness of the compilers, but at the bottom we have an authentic and contemporary narrative. The Brut contains many facts and details not to be found elsewhere; it often adds materially to the narrative of the extant London Chronicles, though in its finished form

¹ Cf. pp. 99, 100 above.

² See pp. 305-6 below.

³ See pp. 299-301 below.

⁷ See p. 126 above.

² See pp. 116-18, 238-41.

⁴ See p. 124 above.

⁶ Brut, pp. 429-30, 493-6.

it omits all the lengthy documents which are so characteristic of them.¹ We do not look to a popular history for reasoned or profound judgements; but we can trace in the Brut the germs of that opinion which in the hands of the Elizabethan historians and dramatists made Henry V the national hero and the struggle of Lancaster and York the theme of a national cycle of tragedies. Dr. Brie has remarked, with some justice, that till of late the London Chronicles have not received the attention which they deserve.² This observation applies with even more justice to the Brut. It requires no doubt to be studied in association with the London Chronicles and extant ballads; but if so studied no future historian of the fifteenth century can afford to neglect it.

The literary importance of the Brut is hardly less great. Its remarkable popularity is proved by the large number of manuscripts which have survived; and also by the frequent use made of it by other writers of the fifteenth century. Dr. Brie enumerates no less than 121 copies of the English original, of which 36 are in the British Museum, and 22 at Oxford³; some of course do not reach so far as 1400, and only a few go beyond 1437. Of the Latin version I notice 11 copies below.⁴ Neither list is exhaustive. The wide diffusion of the Brut in manuscript and the numerous printed editions which appeared between 1480 and 1530 would alone make it important. There is even greater significance in the fact that through the London Chronicles and the Brut a narrative written in English speech for popular use for the first time takes rank as a leading contemporary authority. This of itself should make the Brut of unique interest to students both of our history and of our literature. Viewed simply as a literary production it is of no great merit, though passages of a good, simple, forceful kind are not lacking. However, the immaturity of its style is of small moment as compared with ¹ Some of them are, however, preserved in the transitional copies; see p. 85 above, and Brut, 445-7. Harley 565 seems to represent a copy of the London Chronicle of 1430, from which the Documents have been omitted. To this extent it is an intermediary between the original City Chronicle and the Brut.

² Geschichte und Quellen, p. 115.

³ Id. pp. 3-5.

⁴ See pp. 310-12. Dr. Brie (u.s. pp. 127-8) notices three other copies which end at 1066.

the fact of its existence. Trevisa's translation of Higden's Polychronicon had helped to set the fashion, and was no doubt written to meet a genuine need. But the constant writing and rewriting during the fifteenth century of an original popular history in English carries us much further than any translation of a monastic chronicle, and marks an important stage in the development of our historical literature.

Before leaving the Brut it is necessary to say something of its influence on later histories of the fifteenth century. Jean Waurin, when he compiled his Recueil des Croniques d'Engleterre,¹ took for his chief original the English Brut. Starting from its legendary opening he followed it down to the fourteenth century, when he began to make more use of Froissart, as he did subsequently of Monstrelet. But even in the later part of his history Waurin employed English sources. He had certainly access to a version of the Brut of the type of Harley 53, whence he took his story of 'le grand soufflet', which was the beginning of the quarrel between Henry IV and Percy.² To the same version he may have been indebted for some other details down to 1415;³ but afterwards, so long as Monstrelet lasted him, Waurin had no occasion to use the more meagre English narrative. When he came to Cade's rebellion and the Wars of the Roses his information was of necessity derived from English sources. Waurin himself visited England during these years, and part of his material was no doubt of his own collecting. But his account of Cade's rebellion clearly depends on the common narrative of the Brut and the Main City Chronicle,⁴ with a few details not given there for which parallels can be found in Gregory's Chronicle.⁵ Possibly also he may have used an English written source for the latter years of Henry VI, though certainly after 1458 his narrative is fuller and con-

¹ Ed. Hardy in Rolls Series, and Dupont, Soc. de l'Hist. de France.

² ii. 57, ed. Hardy.

³ ii. 95-8, 167.

⁴ Croniques, v. 261-3; cf. Brut, 517-20.

⁵ The mention of Haywardyn, and the action of the Archbishops, Waurin, v. 263-4, Greg. Chron. 193; at a later point for the disputes of Somerset and York in 1453 (Waurin v. 265) there are further resemblances to the London Chronicle (Gregory's Chron. pp. 195-6).

tains much that is of independent origin, as for instance in his account of Towton, for which he obtained information from some who were there present.¹ Waurin ended his work with the Restoration of Edward IV, the history of which is told in an abridged translation of The Arrivall.²

If the Brut supplied material to a French historian it was also, as we have seen, to win the distinction of becoming the first of English printed histories. Caxton's Chronicles appeared in 1480 and again in 1482; four other editions followed during the fifteenth century, and at least seven within the next thirty years. Caxton's book has often been referred to as though it were in some degree a compilation of his own; but, as before noted, it followed simply the main version of the Brut which ended in 1461. So far as his Chronicles of England are concerned, it is clear that no credit can be claimed for Caxton as the author of the first printed English history. Stow realized this when he wrote of 'The English Chronicle printed by William Caxton and therefore called Caxton's Chronicle'.³

A somewhat better case may be made for Caxton's share in the Polychronicon. When in 1482 he printed Trevisa's translation of Higden he added as an eighth book a continuation from 1377 to 1461. Of this he writes by way of introduction: 'I have emprysed to ordeyne this newe booke by the suffraunce of Almyghty God to contynue the sayd werk bryefly, and to sette in hystoriall thynges, suche as I have conne gete.'⁴ In the colophon he asks pardon of his readers: 'Wher as ther is fawte, I beseche them that shal rede it to correcte it, for yf I could have founden moo storyes I wold have sette in hit moo; but the substaunce that I can fynde and knowe I have shortly sette hem in this book, to thentente that such thynges as have ben done syth the deth or ende of the sayd boke of Polychronycon shold be had in remembraunce and not putte in oblyvyon ne forgetyng.'⁵ The naïve simplicity of Caxton's claim to have here made a new compilation is not entirely without justification. Caxton at the end of the seventh book of his edition of Trevisa

¹ Croniques, v. 339-41.

³ Annales, p. 411.

² See pp. 175-6 below.

⁴ Higden, viii. 522.

⁵ Id. viii. 587.

writes that for later events he could get no book of authority 'except a lytel booke named Fasciculus temporum and another called Aureus de universo'.¹ The former of these, as we have seen,² was made use of by the original compiler of the Chronicles of England. Both, however, were concerned with general history, and for his main narrative in the Polychronicon Caxton was dependent on various versions of the Brut. Here I need deal only with the portion subsequent to 1399. For the first twenty years down to the end of the siege of Rouen he would seem to have compiled his narrative from more than one of the old copies. This is most evident in the account of the death of Richard II, where, after giving the legend of Sir Piers of Exton, he continues, 'The comyn oppynyng of Englysshmen is that kynge Rychard deyde not after the maner a foresayd, but that he deyde other wyse,' and then gives a different story.³ Most, however, of Caxton's narrative comes from the common version which ended in 1419. But he incorporates also some matter from the version of his own Chronicles,⁴ and in some places there are resemblances to one or the other of the Chronicles of London, or to some other version of the Brut.⁵ For the later portion from the siege of Rouen onwards, beginning with chapter 15, the Polychronicon is nearly identical with Caxton's Chronicles. The notice of the fall of Constantinople is correctly transferred from 1450 to 1453; a few things are added, as the siege of Dieppe in 1442, the story of Chalons and Sir Lewis de Buriell in 1449, the battle of Formigny in 1450, and some notes on the fighting at Calais in 1459.⁶

Of the Polychronicon, as of the Chronicles of England, many editions appeared during the next half-century. Though these printed versions are not in themselves of any particular value to the historian, they are of interest to the student of historical

¹ Higden, viii. 353.

² p. 119 above.

³ Higden, viii. 540-1; cf. Brut, pp. 590, 591. This is the Exton legend which comes from Lambeth 84; the other story that Richard starved himself is found somewhat differently in Brut, pp. 360 and 546.

⁴ Higden, viii. 548, 549, 553-4; cf. Brut, pp. 491-5.

⁵ Higden, viii. 548-50, 552-3; cf. Chronicles of London, 69, 70, Nicolas, Chron. Lond. 104, Brut, pp. 495, 554.

⁶ Higden, viii. 567, 571, 573, 582; cf. Brut, pp. 504, 515, 517, 528; some of the added matter appears in Chronicles of London, pp. 150, 158.

literature. Their popularity shows how firmly English was established as the medium, and they are the sources from which later historical writers derived much of their information. But for the further change in the form and treatment of history, for which they had helped to prepare the way, we must look elsewhere.¹

¹ See pp. 258-61 below.

CHAPTER VI

MINOR CHRONICLES OF THE MIDDLE OF THE FIFTEENTH CENTURY

1422-1469

THE Chronicles with which the present chapter is concerned do not lend themselves to any unity of treatment. They have little in common with one another, and are themselves often broken and fragmentary. The majority of them, so far as they are original, and not mere réchauffés of older works, do not cover periods of more than ten or a dozen years, and some of them not so many. It is not therefore easy to classify them to any advantage except in so far as some of them have a certain affinity owing to the fact that they were composed, albeit independently, as Continuations of the Latin Brut. On the other hand it would not be possible to deal with them satisfactorily in the order of the dates at which they chance to end. I must therefore be content to group them as conveniently as may be, and treat each on its own merits. Even so I shall hope to extract from them some illustration of the changes which were taking place in our historical literature.

I have included in this chapter the Chronicle of John Hardyng, in spite of the fact that some of its most useful history belongs to the earliest part of our period. If this fact may seem to have called for an earlier discussion of its contents, its prolongation and the late date of its composition make its treatment here more convenient. Since as regards its contents it is for the greater part a secondary authority, it can only be considered with reference to what has gone before. Furthermore, it derives its most peculiar interest chiefly from the fact that in its original form it was composed in the latter part of the reign of Henry VI. But since it stands apart from all the other histories to be dealt with here, it will be best to take it first.

Hardyng was born in 1378, and as a boy of twelve entered the service of Sir Henry Percy (Hotspur), under whom he fought at the battles of Homildon and Shrewsbury.¹ On the fall of the Percies, he took service with Sir Robert Umfraville, who made him Constable of Warkworth Castle, and at a later date Constable of Kyme, in Lincolnshire. Under Robert Umfraville, and his more famous nephew Gilbert, titular Earl of Kyme, Hardyng had a long experience of war on the Scottish Border and in France. With Robert Umfraville he served in the campaign of Agincourt, and probably also in the sea-fight off Harfleur in 1416, and in the Scottish war of 1417. If he was not in the company of Gilbert Umfraville in the French expedition of 1411, and at Baugé in 1421, he had certainly good sources of information about those events. Through his association with the Umfravilles Hardyng came under the notice of Henry V, who in 1418 entrusted him with a mission to Scotland to spy out the prospects of an invasion of that country, and to collect evidence on the English claim to Sovereignty.² This mission determined the subsequent course of Hardyng's life, and led directly to the composition of his Chronicle. The first-fruits of Hardyng's inquiries were presented to Henry V at Bois de Vincennes, probably in May 1422. According to his own account he was promised in reward the manor of Geddington in Northamptonshire, but lost it through the King's early death.³ The choice of Hardyng for this mission seems to indicate that he had already some reputation for historical research. So far, however, his studies had not taken shape, though in a note in the earlier version of his Chronicle he relates that he received instruction in Justinus's Epitome of Trogus Pompeius from Julius de Caesarinis, who was present in England as a papal envoy in 1426 and 1427.⁴ It is possible that Hardyng paid a second visit to Scotland on the same errand as his first in 1434. At all events he made the alleged offer of a bribe by James I in that year one reason for his claim to be rewarded when

¹ Chronicle, ed. Ellis, p. 351.

² English Historical Review, xxvii. 742, 751.

³ Chronicle, ed. Ellis, pp. 392-3.

⁴ Engl. Hist. Rev. xxvii. 464 n. Ellis, through a misinterpretation of this note, thought that Hardyng had visited Rome in 1424.

he presented a second instalment of documents on the English claims in Scotland to Henry VI at Easthampstead in July 1440.¹ On this occasion Hardyng obtained a yearly pension of £10 as a reward for his services in obtaining certain evidences concerning the king's overlordship of Scotland. Still he did not consider this adequate, and in 1451 put up a fresh petition. By his own account he then actually obtained Letters of Privy Seal granting his desire, but was baulked of its fulfilment through the intervention of Cardinal Kemp.² In the original version of his Chronicle Hardyng states that this had happened six years before the time at which he wrote. Thus we get 1457 as the date for the completion of his Chronicle. It was no doubt the presentation of his work to the King that led to the grant of a further £20 a year in return for the delivery of six documents relating to the Scottish overlordship in November 1457.³ Still Hardyng was not satisfied, and he set to work at once on a revised version of his Chronicle, to which he prefixed a fresh dedication to Richard, Duke of York. This later version was continued to May 1464, and since it contains a reference to Elizabeth Woodville as Queen, cannot have been finished till some months later. Apparently, however, a copy had been presented to Edward IV at Leicester in May 1463, again with a selection of his Scottish documents. Hardyng was then a very old man, and he probably did not long survive the completion of his Chronicle.

This account of Hardyng's life has been necessary to show how closely the composition of the Chronicle was connected with his Scottish mission, and with his endeavour to obtain a reward for his real or fancied services. The services were more fancied than real, since Sir Francis Palgrave had no difficulty in showing that the documents, the majority of which are still preserved in the Record Office, were forged. 'The language, the expressions, the dates, the general tenor, all bespeak the forgery.'⁴ Their concoction affords some proof of Hardyng's antiquarian knowledge and skill, but

¹ Cal. Pat. Rolls, Henry VI, iii. 431, 484, 490.

² Engl. Hist. Rev. xxvii. 743, 752.

³ Palgrave, Documents and Records relating to Scotland, pp. 377-8; Cal. Pat. Rolls, Henry VI, vi. 393.

⁴ Palgrave, Documents, pp. ccxvi, ccxxiii.

inevitably discredits him as a trustworthy historian. The discredit is the greater because it is manifest that his purpose in writing was to urge his claims to reward in return for the forged documents. The references to the Scottish overlordship appear throughout the whole Chronicle as occasion offers, and are coupled with notices of his delivery of the documents, and of his disappointed hopes.

If Hardyng's autobiographical notices have been so little to his own credit, they are of service to us as revealing the purpose with which he composed the two versions of his Chronicle, and as enabling us to fix quite closely the dates of their composition. As we have seen, the first version was completed and presented to Henry VI in 1457. This is shown by the statements that it was six years since his petition for reward had been frustrated by Cardinal Kemp, at that time Archbishop of York and Chancellor,¹ and that some of the Evidences of Scotland had been in his keeping for thirty-six years.² Moreover, the dedication contains a reference to Edward, Prince of Wales,³ whilst much of the conclusion would seem to relate to the early years of the Wars of the Roses. The main part of the Chronicle was probably composed somewhat earlier. The stanzas in praise of Henry V⁴ would seem to have been written before 1449, since in them the King is advised to send the disturbers of his peace over the sea,

To keep your right in France and Normandy.

The favourable tone of the references to Suffolk would also appear to indicate that the time of writing was previous to his fall in 1450. No doubt the original composition of the Chronicle, which in the first version contains nearly 2,700 stanzas, was spread over a considerable period. Hardyng must have set to work on his second version very soon after the presentation of the first to Henry VI, since he dedicates it to Richard of York, who was killed in December 1460. But as I have stated above, this version was not completed

¹ Kemp was made Chancellor on January 31, 1450, and translated to Canterbury early in 1452.

² Engl. Hist. Rev. xxvii. 743.

³ Id. xxvii. 740.

⁴ Id. xxvii. 744-6.

in its present shape till late in 1464, though an earlier copy may have been presented to Edward IV in May 1463.

As regards the form of the Chronicle the second version is much the shorter, containing less than 1,800 stanzas, or about two-thirds the number of the first. The abbreviation is most marked in the earlier part of the Chronicle, with which we are not here concerned. For that part of the fifteenth century which is common to both versions the first has 206 stanzas as against 185 in the second. The abbreviation is really greater, since the second version contains some passages of considerable length which did not appear in the first. It is not therefore surprising that Sir Henry Ellis should have found the text of the first version 'altogether so different from the other copies as not to admit of a collation'. But in spite of the very marked textual variation, the difference in the substantial material of the two versions is not very important. The narrative proceeds on much the same lines, and is for the most part derived from similar sources.

The first version is generally somewhat fuller on the exploits of Hardyng's patrons, the Umfravilles; though it omits the well-known passage describing how Robert Umfraville came to be known as Robin Mendmarket. For the reign of Henry IV the two most noteworthy variations are for Archbishop Scrope's rebellion in 1405, and for the dispute between the Prince of Wales and the King in 1411-12; both of these passages contain some detail which may be derived from the writer's own knowledge. Under Henry V the first version is on the whole the inferior, though it has a rather better account of the 'Foul Raid' in 1417, and supplies some fresh details for the defeat of Clarence at Baugé in 1421. The main narrative of the first version ends with the death of James I of Scotland in 1437. For these fifteen years of the reign of Henry VI Hardyng seems to have followed the Latin Brut. His narrative has no interest except for the character of his references to persons, and especially to Henry VI and Suffolk, of both of whom he writes favourably. The proper history closes with a reference to York's seven years' rule in Normandy, which shows that it was not written before 1446; in the second version there appears a further reference to York's banishment to Ireland, which may possibly indicate that the first version was written before 1447.

The real importance of the first version consists in the introductory dedication and proem, a chapter in praise of Henry V, and three chapters at the end in which Hardyng extols his old master Robert Umfraville, exhorts the King to reform his realm by Umfraville's example, and urges his own claims to reward. The proem and the final chapter are of value for the autobiographical matter which they contain. The stanzas on Robert Umfraville are noteworthy for Hardyng's picture of his old master :

Truly he was a jewel for a King
In wise counsaile and knightly deeds of war ; and also for the fact that, perhaps through his personal interest in his theme, the writer was warmed into something more approaching to poetry than the common doggerel of his main Chronicle. The praise of Umfraville, who was no rioter but a true justice of peace in his country, is made the occasion for an exhortation to Henry VI to rule most specially for the common profit of his Realm :

In every shire with Jakkes and Salades clean
Misrule doth rise :

the poor were oppressed and there was no justice of peace who dared to resist the evil. The King is adjured to withstand the rioters and maintainers, or his monarchy would be ruined ; and is warned to take heed of the fate of kings who kept neither law nor peace. These stanzas seem to have reference to the disorders in the years immediately before 1457. In the stanzas in praise of Henry V Hardyng had contrasted the good order which that King had kept with the little rest which prevailed at the time when he wrote. As I have pointed out above, these stanzas were probably written before 1449. The two passages furnish a valuable illustration of the state of England in the middle of the fifteenth century, which is the more striking for its appearance in an exhortation addressed to the Lancastrian King. Had they been additions to the second or Yorkist version, they might have been discounted as at least coloured by partisan bias; but coming as they do they must be accepted as a faithful picture. The first version closes with a long description of how Scotland might be conquered, with the route to be taken and the distances from town to town. The greater part of this is wanting in the extant copies of the second version; but it probably appeared in some copies, since it is given in full by Grafton, whose main text follows the second version.

In the second version the changes, other than mere abbreviation, were chiefly due to its altered purpose. In his address to Edward IV Hardyng says that the King's kin had been divorced of all the royalty for sixty-three years. So he was anxious to show that Henry IV obtained the crown

Not for descent nor yet for any art
Or might of himself.¹

With this intention he no doubt inserted his prose account of the relations of the Percies with Henry IV, and of the alleged scheme to manufacture an hereditary title for the new dynasty by pretending that Edmund Crouchback was the elder brother of Edward I.² The insertion of lines depreciating Henry IV³ and the curtailing of the praise of Henry V⁴ would follow naturally. These latter changes are significant, but they are not really so important as some additions to the main narrative. Of these the chief are the story of Robert Umfraville at Peebles, and the better accounts of the French war in 1412, and of Baugé in 1421.⁵ The nature of Hardyng's sources is illustrated by the insertion of a stanza describing Sigismund's retinue in 1416,⁶ and of a story of how Henry V put a stop to the private war of two lords.⁷ Of a different character is the prose account in Latin of the campaign of Agincourt,⁸ which is not, as Ellis seems to have supposed, a personal journal of Hardyng's own composition, but is derived in the main from the Gesta Henrici Quinti of Thomas Elmham, though with some small additions relating to the Umfravilles; its chief interest consists in the fact that it seems to be the only instance in the fifteenth century of the

¹ Chron. ed. Ellis, pp. 409, 410.

² Id. pp. 351-4.

³ Id. p. 371.

⁴ Id. p. 388.

⁵ Id. pp. 366-8, 384.

⁶ Id. p. 376.

⁷ Id. p. 383.

⁸ Id. pp. 389-91; cf. Gesta, pp. 13-58.

use of Elmham's prose narrative. Under the first fifteen years of Henry VI there is little change in the actual history. But the alteration in tone is now very noteworthy. The references to Suffolk are less favourable. The praise of Salisbury is amplified, and the marriage of his daughter to Richard Neville, father of the Kingmaker, is recorded. The Earl of Warwick is commended even more warmly than before. Of Henry VI it is said :

He could little within his heart conceive,
The good from evil he could uneth perceive.¹

Warwick is alleged to have sought his discharge from his office with the King out of weariness with his 'symplesse'.² The account of the siege of Calais in 1436 is much shorter; the creditable part played by Edmund Beaufort is slurred over, and even Duke Humphrey is depreciated as having done little 'to count a manly man'.³ The stanzas which Hardyng added to bring his Chronicle down to 1464⁴ contain little of importance. The most valuable part is the final chapter, which deals with events in the north, on which the author may have had special information. Hardyng writing in retirement was hardly in touch with Yorkist sentiment; his chilly reference to the downfall of Humphrey of Gloucester, and his condemnation of Suffolk's murder do not reflect the opinion which became popular after 1461. That in his address to Edward IV he urged the wisdom of treating Henry VI and his family with generosity is to his credit.

As regards Hardyng's sources it is to be noted that the most valuable parts of his main narrative are the passages in which he treats of the exploits of his patrons, the Percies and the Umfravilles, on the Scottish Border and in the French war. These were no doubt written from his own knowledge, and contain material not to be found elsewhere. The rest of the Chronicle contains nothing of original value. The first version ended, like the Latin Brut, in 1437,⁵ and the points of resemblance in the two works are so close as to leave no doubt that the 1437 edition of the Brut, whether in its English

¹ Chron. p. 394.

⁴ Id. pp. 399-408.

² Id. p. 395.

⁵ See pp. 129-31 above.

³ Id. ib.

or Latin dress, was the source from which Hardyng derived his material. In marginal notes¹ to the copy of the first version in Lansdowne MS. 204, Hardyng states that he had based his history on what he had heard or seen, together with the Chronicle of Master Norham, doctor in theology. Of Norham's Chronicle nothing else is known; for though Stow cites it he seems to do so only through the medium of Hardyng. Probably it was merely a copy of the Latin Brut, of which Norham happened to be the owner. Two passages in the second version suggest that Hardyng had there used another copy of the Brut. The list of Sigismund's retinue clearly comes from the same source as that in the Cleopatra Chronicle of London.² The story of how Henry V stopped a private war, though Hardyng claims to write as a witness, seems to refer to the same incident as that in the Lambeth MS. of the Brut.³ The concluding portion of the second version has little or nothing which might not be written from common knowledge.

It will be obvious that Hardyng's Chronicle has no claim to be regarded as an original authority, except for the isolated passages which the author wrote from his own knowledge, and those other passages in which he describes incidentally the state of England at the time at which he wrote. His obvious purpose in writing, and the circumstances under which he composed two different versions, would be enough to discredit him. As a consequence no reliance can be placed on him as a faithful judge of other men. Except for its long currency the Chronicle would not have called for such full treatment. Grafton first printed it in two separate editions⁴ in 1543, following a copy of the second version, which seems to have differed somewhat from those now extant. At a later time Grafton was involved in a dispute as to the true character of Hardyng's work with John Stow, who had access to the very different first version. Hall, Stow, and Holinshed all made use of Hardyng in their own histories. The edition

¹ See Engl. Hist. Rev. xxvii. 476.

² Chronicles of London, p. 124; cf. Tito Livio, Vita Henrici, p. 23, and p. 54 above.

³ Their difference is chiefly typographical.

⁴ Brut, p. 595; cf. p. 126 above.

which Sir Henry Ellis printed in 1812 renewed Hardyng's position as a source of information, but the editor's neglect of the Lansdowne MS. prevents it from being accepted as definitive. The Chronicle is hardly of sufficient importance to justify the reprinting of the complete text of both versions.¹

Hardyng's Chronicle, it is true, has covered the whole reign of Henry VI, but in a very imperfect fashion. Still, even thus there is no other contemporary work besides the Brut of which so much can be said. There are two Lives of Henry VI, but neither of them is of great value from a purely historical point of view. The earlier of these Lives is the one given by Capgrave in his Liber de Illustribus Henricis, which ends in 1446. Most of it is mere pious eulogy; the only piece of criticism of any value is a regret that the sea was not better kept.² The second Life is by John Blakman, who was an original Fellow of Eton College. He states that he wrote from his own knowledge and from information supplied by Henry's attendants. Clearly Blakman was in a position to obtain good material, but his work is in no sense a history. It is concerned almost entirely with the King's virtues, but gives some interesting details about his personal character, and patient conduct during his long imprisonment in the Tower. Blakman very probably composed his panegyric with a view to Henry's suggested canonization after the accession of Henry VII; it is styled De Virtutibus et Miraculis Henrici Sexti, and was edited by Thomas Hearne in the same volume with Otterbourne's Chronicle.

In the second chapter mention was made of various monastic Annals which struggle on into the early years of Henry VI.³ As is there pointed out, they contribute only a few casual facts of interest. Some of them, however, had at least the merit of keeping up an old tradition. The first Continuation of the Croyland Chronicle is not without a certain value for the reign of Henry VI, but this will be more conveniently dealt with in the next chapter.¹ At St. Albans the line of true historians had come to an end with Walsingham. His successors in the scriptorium were concerned chiefly with the history of their Abbey.² Two works of more general interest were, however, composed at St. Albans during this period. The first is an anonymous Chronicle for 1422 to 1431, which is printed with Amundesham's Annales in the Rolls Series. It is clearly a St. Albans compilation, but the humble and unpretending appearance and slovenly character of the manuscript led H. T. Riley, its editor, to suggest that it was rather a private journal of events kept by one of the monks for reference or amusement than an Abbey Chronicle intended for the use of the whole community.³ Be that as it may, the greater part relates to the Abbey and to events which took place in its neighbourhood; prominent amongst these are the records of visits paid to the Abbey by great personages, like Humphrey of Gloucester and his duchess Jacqueline, which have an interest of their own. But interspersed in the history of the Abbey are many notices of wider importance, and in particular of events in London. Of these the greater number are to be found in one or other of the London Chronicles. Such are the execution of John Mortimer in 1424; the story of W. Wawe the thief, and the destruction of bad wine in 1427; the Duke of Norfolk's escape from drowning in 1428; the death of Friar Randolph in the Tower in 1429; the executions of Cole and Hunden; the fight by two men of Feversham in 1430; and the notices of Thomas Baggely and Jack Sharpe in 1431.⁴ The points of resemblance are too numerous and too marked to be entirely fortuitous. It

¹ I have discussed Hardyng's own history, and the first version of his Chronicle at more length in the English Historical Review, xxvii. 462-82. The most distinctive passages of the Lansdowne MS. are printed there on pp. 740-53. Lansdowne 204 is the only MS. of the first version. Harley 661 is the best MS. of the second version; others are Selden B 10, Ashmole 34, and Douce 345 in the Bodleian Library, Egerton 1992 in the British Museum, and one in Lord Tollemache's Library at Helmingham (Hist. MSS. Comm. i. 60). The last three are imperfect.

² De illustribus Henricis, p. 134.

³ See p. 37 above.

¹ See pp. 179-84 below.

² Iohannis Amundesham, Annales, 2 vols.; Registra Abbatum, 2 vols., covering the rule of Abbots Whethamstede, Albon, and Wallingforde.

³ Amundesham, Annales, i. p. xiii. These St. Albans Annales come from Harley MS. 3775, ff. 100-20. They were written in two hands of little later date than 1430. The second hand (ff. 119, 120) is of a similar character to that of the London Chronicle, in the same manuscript. There are some notes by John Stow in the margins.

⁴ See Chronicles of London, pp. 133, 273, 282-3; Nicolas, Lond. Chron. pp. 117, 118; Gregory's Chron. pp. 161, 163, 171; Brut, pp. 441, 453.

may therefore be assumed with confidence that the St. Albans writer had made use of one of the early versions of the London Chronicles. The same volume contains a London Chronicle, which may possibly have been copied at St. Albans¹; but this is certainly not the sole source of the St. Albans Annals, which contain some London matter which does not appear in the ordinary Chronicles, and when on common ground are sometimes fuller. The St. Albans writer may possibly have followed a lost early copy superior to those now extant. Amongst the additions are a story of an impostor, who styled himself the 'Baron de Blakamore', and the account of the complaint of the woman of the Stocks Market against Humphrey of Gloucester.² Both these stories are quoted by Stow,³ notes in whose writing appear in the margins of the manuscript. Amundesham's own Annals from 1421 to 1440 are concerned almost entirely with the history of the Abbey; an exception, if it be one, is the account of Abbot Whethamstede's long visit to Rome in 1423-4.

It is to Whethamstede himself that we are indebted for the second of the St. Albans narratives. This is a far more valuable production (giving the history of the six years from 1455 to 1461), which is incorporated in Whethamstede's Register. The Register as it stands appears to have been drawn up between 1465 and 1476 from two original records. The main subject of the Register is of course the affairs of the Abbey, but a number of lengthy passages bearing on general English history are inserted. The first occasion for such digression comes with the first battle of St. Albans; to a description of the battle is prefixed an account of the causes which led York to take up arms.⁴ There follows a notice of the subsequent Parliament, in which the memory of Humphrey of Gloucester and the character of the Yorkists were cleared.⁵ The Bill of Resumption in the Parliament of 1456 threatened to affect the Abbey, and so receives detailed notice.⁶ The reconciliation of 1458, with its provision of ¹ This is suggested by the similar style of handwriting, see note on p. 150 above. For this London Chronicle see further, pp. 292-5 below.

² Amundesham, Annales, i. 7, 20.

³ Survey of London, i. 58; Annales, p. 369.

⁴ Registrum, i. 159-76.

⁵ Id. 178-86.

⁶ Id. 250-60.

masses for those who had fallen at St. Albans three years before, was also of interest to the Abbey Chronicler; it is consequently described at length, with the full text of the award.¹ The history of the next three years, beginning with Warwick's victory at sea in May 1458, and ending with the first Parliament of Edward IV, is given in much detail, and includes copies of many documents.² It is of course peculiarly useful for the second battle of St. Albans, but the whole history is valuable and important.

Whethamstede had been a friend of Humphrey of Gloucester, and the sufferings of St. Albans at the hands of the northern army in 1461 would naturally have inclined the Abbey Chronicler to the Yorkist side. Hallam asserted that the pillage of the Abbey changed Whethamstede 'from a violent Lancastrian into a Yorkist', adding: 'His change of party is quite sudden and amusing enough.'³ This view seems to be mistaken. The attitude of the writer of the Chronicle is consistent; the record of events was no doubt set down in the original Register as they occurred. Even in 1455 it is clear on which side the writer's sympathies lay.⁴ But for that Whethamstede's lifelong friendship with Duke Humphrey is a sufficient explanation. The acceptance of the Yorkist monarchy, as shown by the favourable reference to Edward IV towards the end of the history,⁵ is not enough to justify the charge of a violent change of opinion. Nor for that matter is the partisanship ever pronounced: Richard of York's haughty conduct in the Parliament of 1460, which is described at length, meets with due criticism in the detailed account of the popular objections to his claims.⁶ The writer feels that York was in need of defence for the breach of his oath to Henry VI, and puts forward the excuse that he had been absolved by the Pope. He seems once more to reveal his own sympathies when he adds that the charges made against the Duke had no great efficacy.⁷ King Henry himself is referred to not ungenerously, but without warmth; he is spoken of as simple and upright, but unable to withstand

¹ Registrum, i. 291-308.

³ Middle Ages, iii. 198.

⁵ Id. 387. ⁶ Id. 377-80.

² Id. 330-1, 336-56, 367-420.

⁴ Registrum, i. 160, 162, 179.

⁷ Id. 383-4.

the evil suggestions of others, who led him into unwise courses and wasteful expenditure.¹ This criticism, though not unwarranted, is certainly not the language of a violent Lancastrian. On the other hand, the history is throughout free from that marked bias which Yorkist opinion has impressed on other Chronicles which were completed after 1461. The historical interest of Whethamstede's Register is not confined to English politics: there are long digressions on the alleged heresy of Reginald Pecock,² on the warfare with the Turks,³ and on the projected Council of Mantua in 1458.⁴ The narrative was no doubt based on material collected under Whethamstede's direction. He had been twice abbot of St. Albans, first from 1420 to 1440, and secondly from 1451 to his death in 1465. During his second tenure of office two Registers were kept, the first ending with his seventh year; the second resuming at once and continuing to the end of the tenth year in 1461. That these Registers were kept under his own direction is clear from the words with which the first was closed, since age and sickness made the toil distasteful.⁵ When the second comes to an end three years later, old age, illness, and failing sight are again pleaded as the reasons why the writer could add no more.⁶ Riley, however, showed that the Register as it now exists is a compilation based on these two originals;⁷ so much is indeed admitted by the compiler's references to 'Registrum alterum, parumper brevius'.⁸ Further, there is much in the existing work for which it does not seem likely that Whethamstede would have been responsible; this is especially the case as regards the violent attacks on William Wallingford, who was a principal officer of the abbey during the whole of Whethamstede's second term. Thus it would seem likely that the Register was put into its present form in the interval between the death of Whethamstede in 1465 and the accession of Wallingford to the abbacy in 1476. The additions which appear to have been made in the process relate, however, to affairs in the ¹ Id. 248-9, under date 1456.

² Id. 279-88.

³ Id. 268-72.

⁴ Id. 331-5.

⁵ Id. 322.

⁶ Id. 420.

⁷ Introduction to Registrum, i. pp. xv-xvii.

⁸ Registrum, i. 375, 383, 420.

abbey; the political history, with which we are here alone concerned, probably remains in the form which it received under the abbot's direction. If Whethamstede was not actually the author of this history, it certainly owes its merits to his inspiration.¹ It is a pity that of the forty-five generally obscure years, from his first election as abbot to his death, he has left us such a record for six alone. One could forgive him even more of his own very bad Latin verses, if his scribe had given us more of his prose.

Hearne printed the parts of Whethamstede's Register which are of interest for political history under the title of Iohannis Whethamstede Chronicon, together with Otterbourne's Chronicle in 1732. He had previously printed the account of Reginald Pecock in his Chronicon Walteri Hemingford. The edition in the Rolls Series is due to H. T. Riley. The manuscript is Arundel 3 at the College of Arms, which has on a fly-leaf the autograph of Robert Blakeney, who was a monk at St. Albans about 1515; this has led to an erroneous ascription of the authorship to him.² The manuscript was purchased by Lord William Howard in 1589, and whilst in his possession was no doubt made use of by John Stow;³ it is also quoted independently in Holinshed's Chronicles.

If the Chronicle contained in Whethamstede's Register stands by itself amongst the Latin histories composed about the middle of the century, there are not wanting in other quarters signs that an interest in History lingered on in monastic houses. The London Chronicles and the English Brut were probably written to meet the desire of laymen for a history of their native land in their own familiar speech. But amongst ecclesiastics the tradition of Latin as the right medium for historical literature was still strong. Perhaps it is not too rash to conjecture that the translation of the Brut into Latin was made primarily to meet their needs. At all events, several of the brief chronicles which were composed by ecclesiastics at this time take the form of continuations of the Latin Brut; whilst in other cases the more original earlier matter shows obvious traces of derivation from an English source. Even in the entirely original continuations we are commonly left with the impression that the author thought, though he did not write, in English. Herein we have evidence of the continuing tradition of Latin, and also of its growing displacement by English.

¹ Duo rerum Anglicarum Scriptores, 2 vols.; Whethamstede's Chronicle forms the second volume.

² Newcome, History of St. Albans, p. 402.

³ Compare his account of events at St. Albans in 1461 (Annales, p. 414) with Registrum, i. 392-4.

The most important, though not the most typical, of the minor Latin histories with which we are thus about to deal is the anonymous Chronicle of Henry VI edited by J. A. Giles in 1846. With the Chronicles for the reigns of Henry IV and Henry V, which are contained in the same volume,¹ I have dealt in previous chapters. Reference was there made to the defective editing of the book,² and here I must deal with it at more length as a preliminary to any criticism of the original writer. Giles himself admits that he was dependent for his text on transcripts made by Petrie, and it is obvious that he had no acquaintance with the manuscripts from which those transcripts were made. Some description of the manuscripts is therefore needful. The complete Chronicle for the reign of Henry VI is given only in Royal MS. 13, C 1, at the British Museum. That manuscript begins with a mutilated copy of the abbreviation of the Pseudo-Elmham's Vita Henrici Quinti,³ followed in another hand by the Chronicle for the reign of Henry VI, which the scribe clearly intended to be read as a continuation of the foregoing. There then follow Chronicles for the reigns of Richard II and Henry IV in the same hand as that for Henry VI. In the other manuscript—Sloane 1776, also at the British Museum—the four Chronicles are formed into a continuous narrative (with a variation for the reign of Henry V as explained in a previous chapter); this manuscript ends imperfectly in 1440. From the fact that the Sloane MS. gives the four reigns continuously, we may fairly conclude that it was the later written. There is, moreover, other evidence which suggests that in the Royal MS. we have the autograph of the original compiler. On two leaves of this manuscript there appear a number of alternative versions for events between 1440 and 1443,¹ which appear to represent various attempts on the part of the author to produce a narrative to his liking. The scribe of the Sloane MS. followed what he no doubt conceived to be the author's final intention; Giles, whose transcript at this point was made from the Sloane MS., consequently gives no indication of the existence of any alternative matter, though some of it should have appeared on page 22 of his edition. The Sloane text ends imperfectly on page 29; on the next page Giles notes 'Hic quedam desunt in manuscripto'; though, as a matter of fact, the Royal MS., from which of course the text is now derived, at this place contains some matter which Giles has omitted.

¹ Incerti scriptoris Chronicon . . . de regnis . . . Henrici IV, Henrici V, Henrici VI.

² See p. 25 above.

³ See p. 63 above.

The hitherto unprinted matter in the Royal MS. is chiefly of value as illustrating the composition of the Chronicle itself. The most interesting thing is a story that Eleanor Cobham was arrested on June 25, 1441, as she sat at supper at the King's Head in Cheap, whither she had gone to witness the Marching-Watch; since the King's Head was the later name for the Crown Seld, which Edward III built for 'the Kings of England and other great Estates, therein to behold the shows of the City',² we get a hint at the overweening pride which went before Eleanor's fall. The statement that Richard of York achieved little in Normandy, because he followed the advice of young councillors and especially of Sir John Oldhall, has a certain interest in view of the Yorkist tone of the later part of the Chronicle.

Giles's Chronicle of Henry VI has, at all events, the merit of being the most nearly complete Latin history of the reign, coming down to 1455. The date of its composition was clearly some years later, probably in or soon after 1460; for there is a reference under 1442 to the death of Eleanor Cobham sixteen years afterwards;³ and under 1447 John Delabere, Bishop of St. Davids, is said to have never visited his diocese as long as he lived⁴—he resigned in 1459; the Yorkist tone

¹ Printed on pp. 339-41 below.

² Stow, Survey of London, i. 257; this is, I believe, the earliest instance of the name 'King's Head' for the Crown Seld.

³ Chron. p. 31.

⁴ Id. p. 35.

of the Chronicle rather points to a date after 1460. The compiler of the Chronicle of Henry VI had, of course, no share in the Chronicles for the three earlier reigns; those for Richard II and Henry IV were much older works, and that for Henry V, though probably abbreviated from the Pseudo-Elmham about 1455, is, to judge from the difference of the handwriting in the Royal MS., not his work. Even the Chronicle of Henry VI is only in a limited degree an original composition. It seems to consist of two portions; the first, from 1422 to 1438, is little more than a compilation derived chiefly from a London Chronicle or the Brut; but the second, which covers the last seventeen years, contains some new and valuable matter. The author was apparently an ecclesiastic. His chief addition in the earlier part is a notice of the Council of Basle and the renewal of the Schism, which was not written till after the death of Eugenius IV in 1447.¹ In this earlier part there is no particular bias. The more original portion, from 1438 onwards, is strongly Yorkist. All the ministers of Henry VI, except Cardinal Beaufort,² are censured; even comparatively humble Lancastrians, like John Langton and John Delabere, successively Bishops of St. Davids, are spoken of with a contempt³ which is probably political. Eleanor Cobham was not likely to have won favour with an ecclesiastic; but her husband's death is alleged to have stirred all the people of England against Suffolk and his colleagues.⁴ The most valuable part is that dealing with the last five years, where we get a good account, from a Yorkist point of view, of events down to the autumn of 1455. The chronology is, however, unsound; the attempted arrest of Edmund, Duke of Somerset, at Blackfriars in December 1450, is followed by the movements of Richard of York in the spring of 1452 without anything to show that a year had intervened;⁵ similarly, though the Chronicle ends abruptly on the eve of the first battle of St. Albans on May 22, 1455,⁶ a notice of the conflict between the Earl of Devon and Lord Bonville, which occurred just five months later, had already been given.⁷ The difficulty of the text is increased by the very inaccurate dates which Giles has put at the heads of his pages. Even at its best the Chronicle is meagre : such value as it possesses is due more to the defect of other authorities than to any merit of its own.

¹ Id. p. 12.² Id. p. 34.³ Id. p. 35.⁴ Id. p. 34.⁵ Id. p. 43.⁶ Id. p. 48.⁷ Id. p. 46.

Let us now turn to three short pieces which were written in the form of continuations of the Latin Brut. The first of these is contained in Harley MS. 3884, wherein the Brut is followed after an interval of seven years by a brief Chronicle for 1445 to 1455.¹ Though very short it contains a few things of interest. A notice of the Parliament of 1445-6 includes a list of the constituencies represented, which is rather curious than important, since it cannot be trusted entirely.² Humphrey of Gloucester is praised as a friend of the Church and of learning, and above all for his gift of books, 'precious, fair, and costly,' to the University of Oxford, 'where his memory will ever be held in honour.' An account of the fall of Suffolk contains some small details which seem to be novel. The reference to Humphrey of Gloucester suggests that the author was an Oxford scholar, a conclusion for which there is some other slight corroboration. The other contents of the volume indicate that the date of writing was before 1460.

In the Sherborne Annals, contained in Harley MS. 3906,³ the continuation of the Brut comes down to 1456. Notices of the burning of Sherborne Church on October 28, 1437, and of the troubles at Sherborne in 1450, prove clearly that the Chronicle was written in Sherborne Abbey. The interest of it consists entirely in the history of 1450, relating how the Commons of the realm were filled with infamy, and fearing neither King nor law made themselves captains in many places. A brief account of the murder of Bishop Ayscough at Edington is followed by a long and obviously local history of the troubles of the same time at Sherborne, which is noteworthy for its definite connexion of the West Country disturbances with Cade's rebellion. The other notices in this Sherborne Chronicle are slight and unimportant. The last is of the comet in June 1456, and the Chronicle was probably written soon afterwards.

¹ Printed on pp. 343-5 below.

² See further, p. 342 below.

³ Printed on pp. 347-9 below.

The third of these continuations of the Latin Brut is of more importance, and extends to 1471. It was printed by Dr. Gairdner from Arundel MS. 5 at the College of Arms, in his *Three Fifteenth Century Chronicles*¹ under the title of 'A Brief Latin Chronicle'. From 1437 to 1460 there are only short notices of isolated incidents, which contain nothing that cannot be found elsewhere. The descriptions of the battle of Northampton, and of the Duke of York's claim in Parliament, are somewhat fuller. The account of the accession of Edward IV is interesting, and for the military and naval movements at the commencement of that King's reign Dr. Gairdner describes it as 'perhaps the clearest contemporary account that we possess'. Of the conclusion from 1464 to 1471 he writes: 'There is comparatively little recorded that is not to be found elsewhere; but the narrative, slender as it is, ought certainly not to be overlooked by any one who proposes to study the history of the period from original sources'.² Dr. Gairdner observes that the notice of the executions after Hexham corresponds with that of Gregory's Chronicle, and must have been derived from a common source.³ Other matter, such as the accounts of Edward IV's coming to London in 1461, and of his coronation, shows points of resemblance to the Vitellius Chronicle of London.⁴ No doubt a good deal of the material used in the City Chronicles was common property, and for that matter those Chronicles themselves were widely distributed. The occurrence of such points of resemblance need therefore excite no surprise. But this Latin Chronicle was itself clearly the work of some one resident in London. It ends with an account of the Bastard of Fauconberg's attack on the City in 1471. It was probably written not long after; but certainly before 1480, since Berwick was still in the hands of the Scots.⁵

These continuations of the Latin Brut have one feature in common that they were clearly written with no other object than to bring the particular copy to which they were attached

¹ Camden Society, 2nd Series, No. 28, 1880, pp. 164-85.

² Preface, pp. xxi, xxvi.

³ pp. 178-9; Gregory's Chronicle, pp. 225-6.

⁴ pp. 173-4; Chronicles of London, pp. 173, 176.

⁵ p. 180.

a little more up to date. It is also characteristic of them all that they bear obvious evidence of the place at which they were written. They were no doubt composed without any literary purpose, or intention for a wider circulation. Such local records were probably common; the preliminary matter, where it did not follow some Chronicle of established reputation, being usually of the most meagre and worthless description, whilst the concluding portion may contain something of value. On the other hand, the compiler may sometimes preserve an interesting fragment of a lost Chronicle, or some curious tradition. A case in point is the Chronicon Regum Angliae, in Jesus College, Oxford, MS. 29, which has a very brief continuation to 1445.¹ It seems to have been written about 1447. The reign of Henry VI is dismissed in a few lines. But the account of the battle of Shrewsbury is noteworthy for the occurrence of the name 'Bolefield', and under Henry V we get a curious story of how Sigismund came to England in 1416 to demand by what title the King held his lands. The latter is of interest since it seems to be the oldest version of the story that Sigismund was not allowed to land till he had disclaimed the right to exercise imperial authority in England. It is likely enough that other Chronicles of similar quality still exist, though their contents would hardly reward the labour of the searcher. The meagre Bury Chronicle which is printed in Arnold's Memorials of St. Edmund's Abbey,² from St. John's College, Oxford, MS. 209, is an instance; it ends in 1471, but has no value. I will, however, describe three specimens which are of some interest.

Cotton. MS. Titus D xv, ff. 7-57, contains a Chronicon Angliae or *Waltham Annals*³ down to 1447. The concluding part is very brief. For the reigns of Henry IV and Henry V it is mainly derived from the English Brut. The account of the battle of Shrewsbury is, however, peculiar, and is again marked by the name 'Bullfield'. The part for the reign of Henry VI is more original, though for the earlier years it may owe something to a London Chronicle. It is, however, of little importance. The writer seems to have been chiefly impressed by 'horrible coruscations of thunder'. A few things are of more interest, the most noteworthy being the story of 'le wode Munday' on June 25, 1436, when a false report of a Burgundian invasion led to a riot in Essex. Of this I have found no other mention. The local references point clearly to Essex, and probably to Waltham Abbey, as the place where the Chronicle was written. Perhaps its interest is greatest as a specimen of what passed for history in monasteries of the time. The writer seems to have been rather relieved when he brought his work to an end in 1447.

¹ Engl. Hist. Rev. xxvi, 750-1.

² iii, 295-7 (Rolls Series). For remains of a Tewkesbury Chronicle see pp. 376-8 below.

³ Printed pp. 350-4 below.

In his *Three Fifteenth Century Chronicles*¹ Dr. Gairdner includes under the title Brief Notes (1422-62) a short Chronicle which was written at Ely. It begins with some bald annals, which end in 1456 and were clearly derived from a London Chronicle. There then follow longer notices, beginning with the Parliament of Bury in 1447. This first notice is interesting, both as giving the current impression in a neighbouring monastery, and for some circumstantial details not found elsewhere. Otherwise there is nothing of any consequence before 1459. The subsequent notices, though somewhat carelessly dated and entered, give useful details. They are obviously a record of news written down from time to time as received at the Abbey. Most are in Latin, but a few are in English. One begins: 'These tidings hath my Lord of Lincoln;' and another: 'These ben the tidings sent out of Scotland.' Events in Northumberland in 1462 are described in the present tense. Even the errors are those which might be expected in flying reports at the time. As a contemporary record of fighting and Lancastrian conspiracy, with a number of new and not unimportant details, the Brief Notes are useful.

In Cotton. MS. Domitian A iv, ff. 246-56, there are some short Latin Annals written at Gloucester Abbey, which are of a worthless character down to 1422, but resume in 1449 with broken notes of more value spread over the next twenty years.² The latter part of the Gloucester Annals begins with a description of a local riot caused by the unpopularity of Reginald Bowlers, the abbot, afterwards bishop of Hereford, who was accused as one of the royal ministers of being responsible for the loss of Normandy. Bowlers was an adherent of Somerset, and this disturbance was no doubt political; it may have had something to do with his arrest by the Duke of York a little later.¹ There is also an account of another local riot in 1463, which was important enough to call for the personal intervention of Warwick and the King. A notice of the battle of Edgcote in 1469 is not without interest; the writer was clearly on the side of Warwick and Clarence. At the end another hand has added a notice of a dispute at Lanthony Priory.

¹ pp. 148-63; from Lambeth MS. 448.

² Printed, pp. 355-7 below.

If one could not have expected to meet with any literary merit in such pieces as those which have just been described, it is somewhat disappointing to find how little different either in matter or form (except for its greater fullness) is the work composed about the same time by a man of superior opportunities and attainments. William Worcester, or William Botoner, as he sometimes signed himself (using his mother's maiden name), was born at Bristol in 1415, and educated at Oxford. He left Oxford about 1438 to take service with Sir John Fastolf as his secretary, and thus appears as the writer of some letters in the Paston Collection.² He was disappointed of his expectations under Fastolf's will, and found himself involved instead in a dispute with John Paston, who would not recognize his claims. Ultimately he parted with all his documents relating to Fastolf's estate to Bishop Waynflete, who was also interested in the will, and received in exchange some lands near Norwich.³ For ten or twelve years from 1458 Worcester resided in London. Subsequently he settled at Pokethorp near Norwich, but spent a good deal of his time in travels through the south of England. His record of these journeys is preserved in his Itinerarium; ⁴ it is a mass of undigested notes, but it gives a few historical details, and is interesting for topography, and especially for that of Bristol. Worcester died between 1480 and 1483. He

¹ Stow, Annales, 392, and p. 297 below.

² See pp. 200, 202-4 below. For a list of his letters (21) see Paston Letters, vi, p. 253.

³ Id. Nos. 401, 822.

⁴ In part edited by James Nasmyth in 1778.

was a man of antiquarian tastes, and an industrious collector of historical and topographical material. Further he had varied intellectual pursuits, with an interest in medicine and astronomy, as well as in classical literature. A translation which he made of Cicero's De Senectute seems to be identical in part with the one printed by Caxton in 1481. From such a man one might have hoped to obtain historical work of value, both in form and in substance. But he was without literary skill; and, though his letters are interesting, did not write well either in Latin or in English. Probably he had suspended his studies whilst in Fastolf's service; for in 1458 a friend wrote that he had gone to school 'to be learned or read in poetry or else in French'.¹

It was during his residence in London that Worcester compiled his Annales Rerum Anglicarum, of which his autograph is preserved in Arundel MS. 48 at the College of Arms. The work extends from 1324 to 1468, and in its earlier part is derived from a London Chronicle. Down to 1440 Worcester used a copy of the recension of that year, adding only the epitaph on Catherine of Valois and the dates of birth of the older children of Richard of York. From 1440 to 1446 his narrative is marked by errors of chronology and repetitions not dissimilar to those in the Vitellius Chronicle. The account of Cade's rebellion comes clearly from the same source as those in the Vitellius Chronicle and in Fabyan, though in some details it is a little fuller than either. Worcester's own material seems to begin about the time when he settled in London towards the end of the reign of Henry VI. Under 1460 he mentions that he had seen the body of Lord Scales lying naked in the cemetery of St. Mary Overy.² At this same point he begins to head each year with the names of the mayor and sheriffs. With much fresh matter he still shows points of resemblance to the Vitellius Chronicle. It is not unlikely that he compiled his Annales even for the latest years from a London Chronicle; though he supplemented it from his own observations and recollections, as, for instance, of the meeting at Clerkenwell when Edward IV was proclaimed

¹ Paston Letters, No. 370.

² p. [773].

King, at which he tells us that he was himself present.¹ The manuscript of the Annales is imperfect: blanks have been left in many places; and at two points one or more leaves are missing, the first where the account of the second battle of St. Albans has been lost, and the second where a gap occurs in the midst of the history of 1463.² Even in their concluding portion the Annales are somewhat bald and uninteresting; but in the absence of any full history of the period they are valuable for the close of the reign of Henry VI, and for the first eight years of Edward IV. The Annales were first printed by Hearne with the Liber Niger Scaccarii in 1728, and were reprinted in 1771. The latest edition is that given by J. Stevenson in Letters and Papers illustrative of the Wars in France.³

Besides his Annales Worcester was responsible for a collection of documents relating to the French war, which he made for Edward IV; after his death his son altered the dedication into one to Richard III. The collection belongs primarily to the Regency of the Duke of Bedford; but numerous other documents are added down to 1452, especially with reference to the cession of Maine and Anjou. This collection was also printed by Stevenson.⁴

Genealogical and Heraldic Rolls dating from the middle of the fifteenth century are not uncommon. They often include brief historical notes, or a short chronicle. The most usual is one attributed to Roger of St. Albans, a Carmelite of London, which begins: 'Considerans prolixitatem Chronicorum;'⁵ it is a general Chronicle from the Creation, with lists of Kings, Popes, &c., and originally ended in 1453, but some copies are continued to Edward IV; its purpose was educational, and it has no value. Some Rolls give

¹ p. [777].

² pp. [776], [782].

³ Vol. ii, pt. ii, pp. [756-92].

⁴ Id. pp. [521-742].

⁵ e.g. Royal MS. 14 B viii (ends in 1453); Harley Roll C 9 (a very fine Roll, with a continuation to Edward IV; it gives his children, ending with Margaret, who was born and died in 1472); Stowe MS. 73 (an English translation coming down to Edward IV; originally a Roll, but now cut up and bound in book form). These are all in the British Museum. Other copies are at Oxford: All Souls College 40 (a large folio, ending in 1453), St. John's College 23 and 58, and Queen's College 168 (where Roger is named as the author); and Trinity College, Cambridge, 636 (later than 1471). See also Hist. MSS. Comm. iii. 232 and Dict. Nat. Biog. xlix. 113.

'The Claim of Richard, Duke of York, in 1460';¹ these have a certain interest as indicating the strength and extent of popular feeling. The Roll in Harley MS. 7353 deserves special mention for its fine illuminations illustrative of the rise of Edward IV, which were apparently executed before 1465.² Lansdowne Roll 6, in the British Museum, is a sixteenth-century roll, which has some brief notes of interest as expressing Tudor opinion.³

Of far more interest than these Genealogical and Heraldic Rolls is one to which I have given the title Collections of a Yorkist Partizan.⁴ It consists of documents relating to the period between the death of Humphrey of Gloucester in February 1447 and May 1452, but is chiefly concerned with the fall of Suffolk and the troubles of 1450. Besides five valuable political poems⁵ and some obscure prophecies,⁶ it includes a variety of notes and memoranda, such as lists of Gloucester's adherents, and of the persons indicted at Rochester in August 1450. Whilst these are useful, a statement of Commercial Grievances is of more value for comparison with the Libel of English Policy, and for its indication of the discontent of the mercantile class with the Lancastrian Government. Other documents, like the account of Events in Kent, &c., in 1452, contain details which are not given elsewhere. The Petition of the Commons of Kent and York's Bill to the King exist in other copies; but those in this Roll supply some noteworthy textual variations. The whole Collection is of great value, and the fact that all these isolated pieces were brought together by a contemporary hand gives it additional interest.⁷ The Collection was probably made soon after May 1452, which is the date of the latest reference. It

¹ e. g. Harley Rolls C 5 and C 7 (see quotation in Notes to Warkworth's Chronicle, pp. 59, 60).

² See Notes to Warkworth's Chronicle, p. 62. The fact that the genealogical tree does not give Edward's Queen or children fixes the date.

³ e. g. of Henry VI: 'He dyd put to silence in the Tower of London, the xxj day of May, 1471, buryid first at Chertesey and after at Wyndesore.' See also pp. 183-4 below. The date of this Roll is after 1513. For further evidence on the true date of Henry's death see pp. 370, 374-5.

⁴ Cotton. Roll, ii. 23. See pp. 358-60 below.

⁵ See pp. 242-4 below.

⁶ See pp. 236-7 below.

⁷ I have accordingly given all the prose pieces, whether previously printed or not, in the Appendix, pp. 360-8 below.

was very probably the work of a London citizen; whoever the writer was, his sympathies were clearly with the Anti-Court party and the Yorkist opposition. There are other Rolls, described as containing charges against Suffolk,¹ which may possibly include material of a similar character.

Another contemporary source, likewise, as it would appear, written by a Londoner, is contained in the Memoranda of John Piggot. Only a fragment of them has been preserved through extracts made by John Stow.² What has thus survived relates to the years between 1450 and 1454. Piggot's Memoranda are rather curious than important, but their gossip and anecdotal character makes one regret that we have no more of them. Such as they are, the information which they contain is nearly all novel. The precise date given for Richard of York's arrival at Stony Stratford on September 23, 1450, is useful.³

Although it is not strictly an historical work it would be impossible to pass over the Theological Dictionary of the Oxford scholar, Thomas Gascoigne, who was born in 1403 and died in 1458. Thus his manhood nearly coincides with the period covered by this chapter. The contents of his work are mainly of a theological or moral interest. Much of the remainder is autobiographical, but instructive as illustrating the condition of the University of Oxford and the Church of England. Incidentally, however, we find also comments and criticisms on political affairs, which are all the more useful since they do not form part of a professed history of the time. But Gascoigne was a bitter partisan, who indulged freely in scandalous gossip. His statements, and in particular his criticisms of persons, must be accepted with caution. With this warning, however, he may be consulted with advantage for many small details and incidents. He has a Yorkist bias, and is hostile to Margaret of Anjou, who, he alleges, 'governed all the affairs of the realm to her own liking'.⁴ The Theological Dictionary is contained in two

¹ See Hist. MSS. Comm. ii. 94, iii. 279.

² ap. Harley MS. 543, f. 144; printed on pp. 370-3 below.

³ Cf. Ramsay, Lancaster and York, ii. 135.

⁴ Loci e Libro Veritatum, p. 204.

volumes at Lincoln College, Oxford (MSS. 117, 118). Selections from it were edited by J. E. T. Rogers in 1881 under the title Loci e Libro Veritatum. Mr. R. L. Poole¹ states that the interest of the book is by no means exhausted by this edition, which 'unfortunately abounds also in errors of transcription'. Some historical memoranda noted by Gascoigne in a Latin psalter (Bodl. MS. Auct. D 4, 5) which belonged to him, furnished the basis for Clement Maidstone's Historia Martyrii Ricardi Scrope.²

The downfall of the House of Lancaster was the occasion of much politico-legal controversy. Though its products do not strictly belong to historical literature, they have some literary interest and considerable importance for the history of the time. They therefore deserve brief description here. The earliest in date is a curious tract dealing with the political situation after the defeat of the Yorkists in October 1459.³ The beginning has been lost, and the title Somnium Vigilantis has been added in a later hand. The title is possibly correct, for the author professes to have had a dream, 'and because what I had witnessed had such likeness to the matters which are now being discussed, I have taken on me to describe it.' The tract is in the form of a dialogue in English between two orators, the one for the exiled lords and the other for the King. The first urges the wisdom of clemency to those who had intended only to the common weal of the realm, and the imprudence of driving to despair men who were still powerful. The King's orator replies at length: after the threefold treason of the lords at Blackheath, St. Albans, and Blore Heath, no claim to mercy could be admitted; the exiled lords had caused 'the subversion and misdrawing of many men', yet those who abode in faithfulness were not less deserving of regard; 'for any fear of your ridiculous reasons it is no need to give them pardon or mercy'. A third person then sums up in French on the side of the King's orator.

This is, of course, the merest sketch of the argument of the

¹ ap. Dict. Nat. Biog. xxi. 43. I am indebted to Mr. Poole's article for part of the above criticism.

² See p. 38 above.

³ Edited by Mr. J. P. Gilson from Royal MS. 17 D xv, ap. Engl. Hist. Rev. xxvi. 512-25.

Somnium, but it will be sufficient to show its general tenor. The date of composition may have been in November 1459, when the Bill of Attainder was under discussion in Parliament, and at the latest it must have been early in the following year. Apart from its value as a clear statement and defence of Lancastrian policy, it has an interest as perhaps the oldest political pamphlet in English prose. Though the use of Latinized words is excessive, the vigorous style would render it noteworthy as a literary production alone. Mr. Gilson suggests with some hesitation that Sir John Fortescue may have been the author. In any case this tract seems to have been the work of a lawyer, and was probably drawn up as an authoritative declaration of the reasons for the policy of the existing government. Fortescue himself speaks of his share in documents drawn up by King Henry's council and passed by a majority of votes; to some of them he was himself 'not well-willing', whilst others were of his own composition.¹ The dialogue is, moreover, a form characteristic of Fortescue's minor works, so that the ascription of the Somnium to him is plausible.

*The Claim of the Duke of York*² is a Yorkist political document put forward in October 1460, of which copies are common. It deals with the duke's right to the throne on legal grounds of succession. Fortescue discussed the same subject from the other side in four tracts:³ De Titulo Edwardi Comitis Marchie; Of the Title of the House of York; Defensio Juris Domus Lancastrie; and A Defence of the House of Lancaster; and at greater length in the second part of the De Natura Legis Naturae.⁴ The direct historical interest of these pieces is not great; they turn chiefly on the right of females to transmit a succession. Subsequently, after 1471, Fortescue produced a refutation of his own arguments in his Declaration upon Certain Writings,⁵ which was composed in favour of the House of York, as a condition of the reversal of his attainder.

¹ Works, pp. 523-4.

² Rot. Parli. v. 375; cf. p. 165 above.

³ Works, pp. 63*-73*, 497-502, 505-10, 517-18; cf. pp. 369-70 below, and Governance of England, pp. 74-6, ed. Plummer.

⁴ Works, pp. 63-184.

⁵ Id. pp. 523-41.

Fortescue's constitutional treatises, the De Laudibus Legum Angliae,¹ written for Edward of Lancaster in France, and the Governance of England,² which was probably written in the first instance for the Prince, but afterwards recast for Edward IV, are of more value. Both are useful for their contemporary statement of English constitutional theory. The latter, with its enunciation of the weaknesses of the Lancastrian government, its bad finance, the danger of great lords, the evil of a poor King, the need for a sound commercial policy, and the importance of good sea-keeping, has the greater historical interest. Fortescue's criticism sums up the mistakes which made it impossible for the House of Lancaster to recover from the discredit of the French war.

Lest from the fact that this chapter has been concerned mainly with Latin Chronicles it should be supposed that the use of that language was still predominant, it should be called to mind that the period here treated witnessed the development and completion in their present form both of the London Chronicles and of the Brut. Nor were those works the only instances of the use of English for historical literature in prose. Capgrave wrote his fragmentary Chronicle of England after 1461, taking his material chiefly from Walsingham.³ Another instance of earlier date is found in a very brief English Chronicle in Add. MS. 34764,⁴ which was written in 1440, and ends with that year. The Collections of a Yorkist Partizan, and John Piggot's Memoranda, though lacking in literary quality, furnish further illustration of the prevalent use of English. However, the Chronicles with which we have been dealing are in themselves sufficient proof of how far the

¹ Id. pp. 337-83.

² Ed. by Mr. C. Plummer in 1885, with an Introduction and Notes of great value to the historical student.

³ See p. 39 above.

⁴ Formerly Phillips MS. 8859. One brief passage, relating to 1421-2 deserves quotation: 'And the same yere at saint Nicholas day preceding was borne our gracious King Henri his son. In whos natiuite rongen al þe belles in London. And where eny syngers weren in eny chirch, þe Maier of London commaunded hem to sing Te Deum Laudamus. And after this worthi prince, þe noble King, thus decessed the last day of August, this noble King Harri þe Sixt began to regne. In whos xvij yere this short treti was ended.'

For a similar note see the London Chronicle E. ap. Brut, p. 448.

use of Latin had decayed. Whethamstede's history is written in a pompous and inflated manner after a bad mediaeval model.¹ Otherwise there is not one which has any pretensions to be regarded as literature. They are bald in style and meagre in substance, mere records of events set down without any sense of proportion or of what is needed for an historical narrative. As already noted, one is often left with the impression that the writer could have expressed himself better in English. It is again a striking circumstance that when any matter can be traced to another source, it is almost always derived, whether directly or indirectly, from an English narrative. One could have no stronger proof that the native speech had already established its claim to be regarded as the proper medium for current historical literature. The jejune notes which were jotted down in the Latin Annals of the middle fifteenth century were the last flicker of the old tradition. With the exception of the meagre work of John Rous, the Latin histories which we shall henceforth encounter are the work of scholars of the New Learning.

¹ Bekynton (Correspondence, i. 115) censured Whethamstede for his bad Latin.

CHAPTER VII

CHRONICLES OF THE HOUSE OF YORK

1470-1485

It is curious how many of the histories of which we have been treating come to an end during the ten years between the accession of Edward IV and the brief Lancastrian Restoration. The Brut in its final shape ends with 1461, and was composed before 1470. The best of the independent continuations of the London Chronicle were also finished during the same time, and the later continuations, with the exception of The Great Chronicle, are of little value till after the close of our period. Hardyng's, Whethamstede's, and Worcester's chronicles, with several of the smaller pieces described in the last chapter, are in a like case. There is no single original history of importance for the years before 1470 which extends beyond that date; and none of later composition which is of more than secondary importance till near that date. Probably it is mere accident; but there is no point in the whole century where we meet with such a complete breach in historical literature. In the last chapter I pointed out how the old tradition of historical Latin came to its feeble end. The stirring events of 1470-1 produced a vigorous crop of English pieces, some of which at all events were intended for popular circulation. The present chapter will deal first with these brief narratives, and finally with those longer works which describe the triumph and downfall of the House of York. If the use of English in the works of the first group was possibly a mere matter of convenience, the works of the second group leave us with no doubt that the writing of history, whether in Latin or in English, was entering on a new stage in its development.

The first to be taken is Warkworth's Chronicle, which, though it covers the first thirteen years of the reign of Edward IV, is chiefly of interest for the events which led up to and followed on the Lancastrian Restoration of 1470-1. It owes its name to the fact that it was written by or for John Warkworth, Master of Peterhouse, Cambridge, at the end of a copy of Caxton's Chronicles which he presented to the College in 1483. The first part of the volume is itself a manuscript copy of the printed text, but its character is marked by the concluding words: 'Fynysched and ended after the copey of Caxtone then in Westmynster.'¹ It is further stated that this copy was ended July 2, 1482. The continuation to 1474 was probably written not long after. Of Warkworth himself there is little to be said. He was elected Fellow of Merton College, Oxford, in 1446, was Principal of Neville Inn in 1453,² and chaplain of William Grey, Bishop of Ely, who was one of the early English humanists. Grey appointed him Master of Peterhouse in November 1473, a position which he held till his death in 1500.

In Warkworth's Chronicle the first eight years of Edward IV are dealt with very briefly.³ The real interest begins with Robin of Redesdale's rebellion in 1469. It is of most value for the events of the following year, and for the battles of Barnet and Tewkesbury. It closes with the capture of St. Michael's Mount in February 1474. The Chronicle is very definitely hostile to Clarence and Warwick;⁴ but though it shows signs of sympathy for Henry VI,⁵ is rather to be described as critical of Edward IV than definitely Lancastrian. The condemnation of John Tiptoft, Earl of Worcester, for his executions by law of Padua,⁶ shows no more than the general detestation for that brutal, cultured pupil of the Italian Renaissance. On two points Warkworth's evidence is of special value. First for the death of Edward, Prince of Wales; who, he says, was slain in the field whilst he cried for succour to Clarence.⁷ The second for the death of Henry VI, who 'was put to death the 21st day of May, being then at the Tower the Duke of Gloucester'.⁸ If the first clears Richard III of having murdered the Prince in cold blood, the second proves that in his

¹ Warkworth's Chronicle, p. xxiv.

² Brodrick, History of Merton College, p. 236.

³ Chron. pp. 1-6.

⁴ Id. pp. 8, 15.

⁵ Id. p. 12.

⁶ Id. pp. 5, 9.

⁷ Id. p. 18.

⁸ Id. p. 21.

lifetime he was suspected of the murder of Henry VI. The two stories together show that Warkworth was not simply partisan, for the story of the Prince's murder was certainly current before Warkworth wrote his Chronicle;¹ on the second point he was not likely to have been more explicit whilst Richard was alive. Warkworth had a fancy for describing portents,² and such physical phenomena as comets; but in this he was not so peculiar that we need discredit or disregard his more serious contributions.³ Extracts from Warkworth's Chronicle were made by Leland;⁴ whence it comes that Stow shows some acquaintance with it.⁵ The Chronicle was edited for the Camden Society in 1839 by J. O. Halliwell (afterwards Halliwell-Phillips), and in modern spelling in Chronicles of the White Rose.⁶ The notes in Halliwell's edition contain much useful information, with extracts from other sources (which are still in some instances unprinted). Of particular interest are the account of events in the North in 1464,⁷ and the document which Clarence and Warwick issued from Calais on July 12, 1469.⁸

For the events of 1470-1 we obtain a fairly consecutive and full account in a series of narratives and documents of a more or less official character. The story is begun in the Chronicle of the Rebellion in Lincolnshire in 1470, which was edited by J. G. Nichols for the Camden Miscellany, vol. i, in 1847, from Vincent MS. 435 at the College of Arms. It deals only with the events of three weeks, from the King's departure from London on March 6 to his stay at York after the suppression of the rebellion. There can be little doubt that we have in it an official account put forward on the King's behalf by some one who had accompanied him on his journey. It must have been drawn up after John Neville had been made Marquis of Montague on March 25,⁹ and of course before the return

¹ Waurin-Dupont, iii. 290; cf. Karl Schmidt, Margareta von Anjou, p. 162 (Palaestra, liv).

² Cf. the story of the Wemere on p. 24.

³ Professor Oman's criticism of Warkworth's Chronicle (ap. Political History of England, iv. 503), as 'mainly notable for portents and marvels' is hardly fair.

⁴ Collectanea, ii. pp. 499-509.

⁵ Cf. Annales, pp. 422-4; and Warkworth, pp. 7-10, 13, 14, 16-18.

⁶ pp. 101-40.

⁷ pp. 36-9, from College of Arms MS. L. 9.

⁸ pp. 46-51, from Ashmole MS. 1160.

⁹ Camden Miscellany, i. (2), p. 12.

of Warwick in the following September. There is in it a deliberate purpose to implicate Warwick and Clarence in the Lincolnshire Rebellion. Thus it is a purely partisan document; but it is of great value for its detailed account of Edward's movements, and for his communications with Warwick and Clarence. The Chronicle was supplemented by the Confession of Sir Robert Welles, to which allusion is made in the text.¹ This Confession was printed in Bentley's *Excerpta Historica*² in 1831, and again in the Notes to the Chronicle.³ Though apparently only a single copy of the Chronicle has survived, its circulation at the time is shown by the use which Waurin⁴ made of it.

The Lincolnshire Rebellion and the colour which Edward IV put upon it led directly to the flight of Clarence and Warwick. The sequel is told in The Manner and Guiding of the Earl of Warwick at Angiers, from the 15th day of July to the 9th of August, 1470. This again is a semi-official document describing the negotiations between Warwick and Margaret of Anjou, and how the scruples of the latter were overcome and a reconciliation effected through the mediation of Louis XI. It is preserved in a transcript made by Stow in Harley MS. 543, and was printed in Sir H. Ellis's Collection of Original Letters,⁵ and again in Chronicles of the White Rose.⁶

For the events of the Lancastrian Restoration the chief English authorities are Warkworth, the London Chronicle,⁷ and the Croyland Chronicle, supplemented by the Paston Letters. For the return of Edward IV we have once more an official narrative in the Historie of the Arrivall of Edward IV, which was edited by John Bruce for the Camden Society in 1838. This document also owes its preservation to John Stow, who transcribed it⁸ from a copy in the possession of his friend, William Fleetwood, the Recorder of London, and from this circumstance it is sometimes styled 'Fleetwood's Book'. It was written avowedly 'by a servant of the King's that presently saw in effect a great part of his exploits, and

¹ Camden Miscellany, i. (2), p. 15. ² pp. 282-4, from Harley MS. 283.

³ pp. 21-3. ⁴ Chroniques, v. 587-93. ⁵ Second Series, i. 132-5.

⁶ pp. 229-36. Stow made brief use of it, Annales, p. 422.

⁷ Chronicles of London, pp. 181-3; probably written in 1474.

⁸ ap. Harley MS. 543, ff. 31-49.

the residue knew by true relation of them that were present at every time'.¹ No doubt it was composed as an official account to the order of Edward IV, who sent a French version of it to the Burgomaster of Bruges, with a letter dated May 29, 1471, only three days after the conclusion of the narrative.²

The Arrival deals with a period of less than three months, from March 2, when Edward IV first took ship at Flushing, to his coming to Canterbury on May 26 after the discomfiture of the Bastard of Fauconberg in his attempt on London. As such it is the history of a campaign which is described with great detail and exactitude. The writer shows himself a good military historian, and excels in his accounts of the two battles of Barnet and Tewkesbury. Professor Oman remarks that he 'possessed the true military eye, and can describe a campaign and a battle in a way that none of his contemporaries can equal'.³ The narrative is manifestly partisan, but for the most part it is a statement of facts as to which it is to be trusted. Its partiality comes out in the glossing over of the death of Edward, Prince of Wales, and of the executions after Tewkesbury;⁴ and again in the allegation that Henry VI died in the Tower 'of pure displeasure and melancholy'.⁵ This latter statement, with the post-dating of Henry's death on May 23 (the balance of other evidence points overwhelmingly to the night of May 21-22)⁶ reads like a deliberate attempt to conceal the truth. Apart from such defects The Arrival is by far the best account which we possess of the recovery of the throne by Edward IV. It is, moreover, a good vigorous piece of English prose. The author, whoever he may have been,⁷ was a well-skilled writer, with a sound understanding of what was requisite to his purpose.

The French version of The Arrival was probably intended for the information of Edward's friends and allies on the Continent. Waurin had seen it and incorporated an abridgement

¹ Arrival, p. 1.

² Waurin-Dupont, iii. 146; a copy was sent to Charles the Bold on May 28, see Note on p. 181 below.

³ Political History of England, iv. 504.

⁴ pp. 30, 31.

⁵ p. 38.

⁶ See further, pp. 370, 374 below.

⁷ See a suggestion on p. 183 below.

in his own History.¹ Though Waurin's version is very much shorter on the whole, he makes some additions in the earlier part, especially on the message sent to Edward by the Archbishop of Canterbury and Bishop of Rochester.² He also gives a much fuller account of the King's entry into York and of his negotiations with Martin of the Sea.³ Later on Waurin mentions that it was from Dunstable⁴ that Edward sent his 'comfortable messages' to the Queen; there is an obvious hiatus in *The Arrival*⁵ at this point. Waurin would seem to have had a more correct text than the existing English copy.⁶ Another French version exists in the Public Library at Ghent. Of this an English translation was printed in *Archæologia*⁷ in 1827. The French text was edited for the Caxton Society by J. A. Giles in 1839 as La Révolte du Conte de Warwick, and by Mlle Dupont in her edition of the *Mémoires*⁸ of Philippe de Comines. This second French version is very much shorter than the one given by Waurin. A modernized text of The Arrival was given in Chronicles of the White Rose.⁹ Of all these various copies only Bruce's edition of The Arrival and the version in Waurin call for attention. Stow has of course made use of The Arrival in his Annales,¹⁰ and through Stow or Fleetwood Holinshed¹¹ also consulted it. Amongst later historians Sharon Turner and Lingard quoted it from Stow's transcript.

The last of the English pieces of this time is the imperfect narrative which is commonly known as Hearne's Fragment, because it was first published by Thomas Hearne at the end of his edition of Thomas Sprott's *Chronicle*¹² in 1719, from a manuscript lent to him by a learned friend. The writer was, by his own account, acquainted with Edward IV, and declares his purpose to be 'to write and show those and such things, the which I have heard from his own mouth. And also in part of such things, in the which I have been personally

¹ Waurin-Dupont, iii. 96-145.

² Id. iii. 98.

³ Id. iii. 103-7.

⁴ Id. iii. 120.

⁵ p. 15.

⁶ Ramsay, Lancaster and York, ii. 365.

⁷ xxi. 11-23.

⁸ iii. 281-91.

⁹ pp. 35-96.

¹⁰ Annales, p. 412.

¹¹ Chronicles, iii. 303, where it is cited as 'W. Fleetwood'.

¹² pp. 283-306, with the title A Remarkable Fragment of an Old English Chronicle.

present as well within the realm as without, most especially from the year of our Lord 1468 to the year of our Lord 1482, in which the forenamed King Edward departed from this present life'.¹ But if the writer thus claims that he had been an eyewitness of what he describes, he shows equally that he did not commit his history to writing till long after the time to which it relates. Thus he refers to the Chronicle of Robert Gaguin, the French historian, which was only printed in 1497.² Again, he refers to the 'late counterfeiter of Chronicles' as worthy to be punished with the printer for affirming that Clarence was elder brother to Edward IV;³ and 'to the lewd fellow that drew those last burnt Chronicles', as writing falsely that Mary of Gueldres was proposed in marriage to Edward IV.⁴ These references seem to intend Fabyan's Chronicle,⁵ which was first printed in 1516, and is said to have been burnt by order of Cardinal Wolsey. Finally he claims as witness to the truth of his history 'the right illustrious Thomas, Duke of Norfolk, Treasurer of England';⁶ Howard was not created Duke till 1514, and resigned the Treasurership in 1522. We have thus sufficient evidence that Hearne's Fragment was written between 1516 and 1522.

Hearne's Fragment begins with the accession of Edward IV, and ends abruptly in September 1470, on the eve of the King's flight from England. It is somewhat brief for the earlier years, but lengthens out in 1468, at the point where the author states that his own chief interest began. In spite of his profession to write from his own knowledge, and of his expressed contempt for Fabyan, he seems to have drawn a good deal of information from that writer or the City Chronicle.⁷ Still, he has much fresh and interesting detail not preserved elsewhere; it is a pity that we have lost his account of the last twelve obscure years of Edward IV, in which he claimed to have been particularly conversant. The Fragment was by its own showing written to combat Tudor or Lancastrian prejudices; its sympathy is of course Yorkist. Both for this reason, and on account of the late date at which it was written from memory, it must be used with caution. It is printed with modernized spelling in Chronicles of the White Rose.¹

¹ pp. 98-9.² p. 297.³ p. 284.⁴ p. 294.⁵ Cf. Fabyan, p. 654.⁶ p. 299.⁷ Cf. Chronicles of London, pp. 173-5, 177-8; Fabyan, 638-9, 655; Fragment, pp. 284-5, 294. It should be noted that all these instances are before 1469.

In addition to the English narratives above described, there is a short Latin piece which deals exclusively with the events of 1471. This consists of some rough Yorkist Notes written on a leaf at the end of Arundel MS. 28 at the British Museum. They have no sort of literary pretension, but contain some useful details. Since they have not infrequently been quoted, I have included them in the Appendix to this volume.² The brief narrative from a *Tewkesbury Chronicle*³ is of a similar quality.

In somewhat marked contrast to the excellence of the material for the history of the downfall of the House of Lancaster is the lack of any absolutely contemporary narrative for the next few years. We must depend chiefly on the accounts given by the Croyland Chronicler, Sir Thomas More, and Polydore Vergil. Though the first wrote from personal knowledge and the latter two had good information, all three composed their histories after the overthrow of Richard III, and were in a greater or less degree influenced by subsequent opinion. The history of the reign of Edward IV which Stow gave in his Annales has always been recognized as possessing original value; the discovery of *The Great Chronicle of London*⁴ shows that it was based on a record kept at the time. The Paston Letters, though still useful, are less rich in material for this period than for the twenty years from 1450 to 1470. Otherwise we have little of a strictly contemporary character except some records of state ceremonies drawn up by heralds and court officials. These are naturally of more interest for social than political history. The most important of them is the *Record of Bluemantle Pursuivant*⁵ for the years 1471 and 1472. It is chiefly concerned with the festivities at the reception of Louis de Gruthus by Edward IV in September–October 1472. But Bluemantle's account of his meeting with Charles the Bold on September 11, 1472, has a wider interest. Of a similar character, though of an earlier date, are the

¹ pp. 5–29.

² See pp. 374–5 below.

³ See pp. 376–8 below.

⁴ See pp. 100, 101 above.

⁵ See pp. 379–88 below.

accounts of the tournament between Anthony Woodville and the Bastard of Burgundy in 1467, and of the marriage of Margaret of York to Charles the Bold in 1468.¹ Later records of this class are the descriptions of the funeral of Edward IV² and of the coronation of Richard III.³ These records, if only occasionally and incidentally of use for political history, contain some noteworthy illustrations of social life and court ceremonial.

It is, however, in the Continuation of the Croyland Chronicle that we must find our best account of the last twelve years of the reign of Edward IV. The writer is the only English historian of nearly contemporary date, and his work is by far the most important contemporary source of English origin. For anything else of nearly equal value we must go to the Mémoires of Philippe de Comines. There are two Croyland writers who dealt with our period. The first, who ended his history in 1470, compiled a *Continuation*⁴ of the spurious Croyland Chronicles attributed to Ingulph and Peter of Blois. His work is devoted chiefly to the history of his abbey, and though he introduces occasional references to political events during the whole period from 1400 onwards, the late date at which he wrote deprives the majority of them of authoritative value. Some of the most interesting passages are those which relate to the Beaufort family, who owned Deeping, near Croyland.⁵ Under the reign of Henry V he gives the tennis-ball story, and a story of the King's religious devotion at Agincourt.⁶ The latter seems to be peculiar, but the former, with the rest of his narrative, probably comes from some popular source like the Brut. As the writer approaches his own time the interest of his work naturally increases. The hostile references to the rule of Suffolk, and the accounts of the Parliament in Bury, and of Cade's rebellion are not undeserving of

¹ Excerpta Historica, pp. 176-212, 227-39.

² Archaeologia, i. 349; Letters of Richard III, i. 3-10 (Rolls Series).

³ Excerpta Historica, pp. 380-4; Antiquarian Repertory, i. 28-64.

⁴ Gale, Scriptores, i. 494-546. Printed in 1684; there is an English translation by H. T. Riley, Bohn's Library, 1854. Gale used a manuscript belonging to Sir John Marsham. His own transcript is Corpus Christi College, Oxford, MS. 208. The Cotton. MS. Otho B xiii was almost entirely destroyed in the fire.

⁵ Id. i. 499, 513, 518, 519, 539.

⁶ Id. i. 500.

attention.¹ A description of the state of England in the last years of Henry VI,² though coloured by Yorkist sympathies, is also noteworthy. The historical value of this Continuation really begins with 1461, where there is a vivid account of the terror at Croyland after the Lancastrian victory at Wakefield.³ The history of the first nine years of Edward IV is brief; but as a strictly contemporary account is sometimes useful, especially for the events of the summer of 1469, when the King was in the neighbourhood of Croyland.⁴ The writer is decidedly Yorkist in sympathy; but he is hostile to the Woodvilles, and favourable to Warwick. His work ends with the death of Abbot Litlington in January 1470.

The second *Continuation*⁵ of the Croyland Chronicle is of much more importance. The author states that he was moved to undertake his work, beginning with Ludlow Field in 1459, out of regard for the unworldly ignorance of his predecessor, who though well skilled in things divine knew nothing of profane affairs. He tells us that he completed the writing of his history in ten days, finishing it on April 30, 1486.⁶ Sir Clements Markham has argued that there is 'absolute proof that this Continuation of the Croyland Chronicle was written by at least two monks'.⁷ The first, whom he calls 'prejudiced', he makes responsible for the history of Edward IV; the second, who carried it on to 1486, he calls 'credulous', and says that though generally accurate he knew nothing of the outer world. But near the end of the work the author repeats his motives for writing almost exactly as he had stated them at the start, and says expressly that his narrative covered the whole twenty-six years from Ludlow Field to Bosworth.⁸ Against this positive statement any argument from internal evidence would be untenable. There is, moreover, not the slightest real ground for suspecting a dual authorship; the history presents every appearance of being the work of a single hand. Sir Clements Markham's opinion to the contrary rests on the reference to the death of Henry VI: 'May God

¹ Gale, Scriptores, i. 521, 525, 526. ² Id. i. 529. ³ Id. i. 530, 531.

⁴ Id. i. 542, 543.

⁵ Id. i. 549-78.

⁶ Id. i. 549, 575, 578.

⁷ Richard III, His Life and Character, pp. 175-9.

⁸ Gale, Scriptores, i. 575.

spare and grant space for repentance to him, whosoever dared to lay such sacrilegious hands on the Lord's anointed. The doer may earn the title of tyrant; the sufferer that of a glorious martyr.'¹ This Sir Clements Markham considers can only have been written whilst the tyrant, whether Edward IV, Richard, or Lord Rivers, was still alive; but the allusion which follows immediately to the miracles wrought by the dead King is probably of later date than his translation from Chertsey to Windsor in 1484.² The words of the chronicler are no doubt intentionally vague; the reference to space for repentance, if it is to be pressed, may allude only to the actual murderer, who was not of necessity Richard himself.³ Other references also show that the Chronicle was throughout written after the death of Edward IV.⁴ I have dwelt on this point both as establishing the credit of the continuator and as tending to destroy whatever argument in favour of Richard III may depend on the theory of a dual authorship.

The continuator of the Croyland Chronicle shows himself in his history to be neither a prejudiced nor a credulous monk.⁵ He describes himself as one of the King's councillors, and a Doctor of Canon Law, who in the summer of 1471 was entrusted with a mission to Charles the Bold to negotiate an alliance.⁶ No full record of this mission appears to be preserved, and so unfortunately we have lost a sure clue to the authorship of the Chronicle.⁷ The writer seems to

¹ Id. i. 556 'Parcat Deus et spatium pœnitentie ei donet, quicunque tam sacrilegas manus in christum Domini ausus est immittere. Unde et agens, tyranni: patiensque, gloriosi martyris titulum mereatur.'

² Rous, Historia Regum, p. 217; cf. Ramsay, Lancaster and York, ii. 527; no miracles of earlier date seem to be recorded.

³ Rous (Historia Regum, p. 215) says: 'Henricum sextum per alios, vel multis credentibus manu pocius propria, interfecit.'

⁴ Gale, Scriptores, i. 562—fere biennio ante mortem Regis—, and 563—'mala . . . quae mox huic Regi et suae clarissimae posteritati miserabiliter evenerunt.'

⁵ It is at least probable that he was not a monk at all: see Note 7 below.

⁶ Gale, Scriptores, i. 557; he found Charles at Abbeville. Charles was there, with occasional short intervals, from June 14 to August 5: see Comines-Lenglet, ii. 98. The writer went by Boulogne, as Calais had not been recovered; when he returned Hastings had taken possession of Calais. The probable date was early in June.

⁷ Edward IV wrote to Charles the Bold from Canterbury on May 28, sending him a 'mémoire en papier' with an account of his good fortune (i. e. a copy of The Arrival). The bearer, 'Pierre Courtois, son serviteur et have accompanied the King on his expedition to France in 1475, and his accounts of events at court, and especially of the scene at the trial of Clarence, read like the work of an eye-witness.¹ So also the history of what took place at London in the summer of 1483² seems to be written from personal knowledge. The author was thus well qualified both by knowledge and experience for his task. The Chronicle is just the kind of work which we might expect to have been written down from memory by a well-informed man of affairs. In spite of the occasional insertion of matter relating to Croyland, it is no mere monastic annal, but a careful judgement of Edward's character and policy, a sound specimen of critical history, in the best sense in which that expression can be used of a contemporary writer who was unavoidably influenced bien familier et secrétaire,' would give further news (Plancher, Hist. Générale de Bourgogne, iv. p. ccvi.). Peter Curteys was keeper of the palace at Westminster in 1472, and keeper of the Great Wardrobe from 1480 (Cal. Pat. Rolls, Edward IV, ii. 295, iii. 198, 222). He lost his offices as from September 1483 (id. iii. 438, 513). On September 24, 1485, they were restored by Henry VII, 'in consideracioun of the true hert and servise that our well-beloved servant Peter Curteys hath borne and doon unto us, and during his life entendeth to doo, as of the great persecution, jupardies, and peynes, robberyes and losses of his goodes, which he hath suffered for our sake and quarelle, and for the same hath long tyme kept the sanctuary at Westminster in grete hevynesse, payne and fear.' In similar terms Curteys was also restored to his office of feodary of Leicester (Campbell, Materials for the History of Henry VII, i. 27, 49). In February 1486 he was gentleman and usher of the King's chamber, and was alive as late as October 1490 (id. i. 326; ii. 500, 517). Thus, like the Croydon Chronicler, he was in the service of Edward IV till his death, was present in London at the time of Richard's usurpation, and went into retirement till after Bosworth. But there is no evidence that Peter Curteys was a Doctor of Canon Law, though he might possibly have claimed to be a Royal Councillor. Nor can we connect him with Croyland. On the other hand it is remarkable that the Croyland writer refers intimately to events in the Sanctuary at Westminster (pp. 567-8), though most of the rest of his narrative for these later years seems to depend on report. Further, it is not certain that the writer was a monk at Croyland; he may have been only a visitor. It is curious that the author of a third continuation (Gale, Scriptores, i. 581-93), who was apparently a monk at Croyland in 1489, does not seem to have known who the second continuator was ('ille quicunque sit'); this suggests that the second writer of 1486 was not a monk. Peter Curteys as feodary of Leicester might have come to Croyland on business. The coincidences in the careers of Curteys and the Chronicler are sufficiently curious. But the difficulties in the way of identifying them are great. Therefore the Continuation of the Croyland Chronicle must be left anonymous. Both the Nuncii Rolls and the Wardrobe Accounts, which might have thrown some light on the mission to Charles the Bold in June 1471, fail at that point.

¹ Gale, Scriptores, i. 558, 562.

² Id. i. 566.

by the opinion of his time and his own experience. Though in its language it conforms to the old tradition, in its outlook and manner of treatment it has departed from it altogether. As a literary production it belongs to a new era.

The Continuation begins with 1459, because, as the author observes, it is necessary to have a clear understanding of the development of affairs. The history of the first ten years is dealt with cursorily, the author, unlike his predecessor, favouring the King rather than the Earl of Warwick. The fuller narrative begins with the return of Edward IV, the description of which shows some resemblance to the official account of The Arrival. May the continuator, who was certainly at this time in the King's service, have been responsible for drawing up that account? More important is the history of the subsequent years, with its criticism of Edward's policy, his finance, and his habits of life. Though the writer's opinion of Edward as a king and statesman is on the whole favourable, it is not that of a flatterer. His design, as he states, was to write his history freely without any conscious admixture of untruth. So he shows himself critical of the King; and when he relates that men of experience wondered how one who was so addicted to luxury and licence should have shown himself so capable in affairs, he no doubt expresses his own opinion.¹ With the death of Edward IV the writer's attitude changes. His history of the usurpation and reign of Richard III is certainly conceived in a hostile spirit. His own original opinion seems to have been on the side of Hastings, and when he states that the more prudent members of the Council were opposed to the claims of the Woodvilles, there can be no doubt that he expresses a judgement which he helped to form.² To Richard's usurpation he was naturally opposed, and he is not always fair in his criticism, as, for instance, when he alleges that Richard at once appropriated all his brother's wealth.³ He clearly believed that Richard was responsible for the death of his nephews.⁴ But if

¹ Id. i. 564.

² Id. ib.

³ Id. i. 567; cf. Gairdner, Richard III, p. 145, 2nd ed.

⁴ Gale, Scriptores, i. 567-8; he says that the Princes were still alive during Richard's progress in the North, but that before Buckingham's rebellion in October the rumours of their death had been spread abroad.

allowance is made for his personal attitude the history may be accepted as a vigorous and truthful presentment of the opinion of the time. It does not, however, rest upon the same inner knowledge of political events as the account of the last ten years of the previous reign. The writer was no doubt in retirement, whether at Croyland or in sanctuary elsewhere, and was for the most part dependent for his information on general report and common opinion.

The *Historia Regum Angliae*¹ by John Rous of Warwick calls for but brief notice. Only the last dozen pages belong to the fifteenth century, and these in their earlier portion contain nothing of note save the story of the connexion of Henry V with Oxford. However, the seven pages which are devoted to the reigns of Edward V and Richard III are not without value. There is some interesting matter on Anthony Woodville, including an imperfect version of the ballad which he wrote before his death. Richard III is described as a tyrant born with teeth and weak in body, his left shoulder lower than the right, but a noble knight; he is said to have been responsible for the death of Henry VI, and, as many believed, to have killed him with his own hand; obviously Rous also suspects him of the death of his nephews. But except for a few details of Richard's movements and Buckingham's rebellion, and for a notice of the translation and miracles of Henry VI, Rous's work has little historical value otherwise than as giving the popular version which was current in the early years of Henry VII. Rous himself cannot escape the charge of time-serving. He also compiled a Roll of the Earls of Warwick, which in its first English version, written between 1477 and 1485, is strongly Yorkist and even laudatory of Richard III; a Latin version which he made under Henry VII is as pronouncedly Lancastrian. A 'Life of Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick', in Cotton. MS. Julius E iv is of interest for its fifty-three beautiful drawings of events in the earl's life.¹

It is impossible to regard such statements as this and that in The Great Chronicle of London as mere later inventions: whether it was well founded or not, the opinion that the Princes had been murdered was current during Richard's lifetime. The rather late Lansdowne Roll 6 (see p. 165 above) has a corroborative story which has not, I think, been previously printed: 'In the yere of our Lord 1482 Maister Thomas Warde, doctor of phisike and chapleyne to King Edward the iiij^{te} was sent to King Loyis into Fraunce for the payment of the yerly trowage, and he beyng ther King Edward dyed. How beyt the accustomed some was deliuered, and aboue that ye said King Loyis gave vnto hym for the yong prince, King Edwards son, l. thousand crownes of gould in hope to haue as good amitie wth hym as he had wth King Edward, his fadir: and or euer the said doctor mought arryue at Boleyne ye said King Loyis was certified how y^t Richard, Duke of Gloucester, the protector, had put his neviens to scilence and vsurped the crowne vpon thaim wth great tyranny. Wherefore the said doctore Warde was countermanded to Paris, and was in captiuite ther a great space. And so that Annuite was noyt paid vnto ye King Harry came to Boloigne wth a grete army. And then he was repayed wth a better suerte. A^o 1493.' This is set in the margin against a statement: 'Ye which Edward and Richard were put to final scilence by King Richard their vnkle.' The Lansdowne Roll was not written till after 1513, but the story of Dr. Warde seems too circumstantial to be entirely false. Louis XI acknowledged a letter from Richard III announcing his accession on July 21, 1483 (Ellis, Original Letters, 3rd Series, i. p. 108). The story that the Princes had been murdered was certainly believed in France in January 1484 (Journal des États Généraux . . . en 1483-4, p. 39). For the employment of Warde on missions in France, see Campbell, Materials, &c., ii. 85, 128, 377.

¹ Ed. Hearne, 1716 and 1744.

The History of King Richard III, which is commonly attributed to Sir Thomas More, first appeared in an incorrect version in Grafton's prose continuation of Hardyng's *Chronicle*² in 1543, and was also made use of by Hall in his Chronicle. In 1557 William Rastell, who was More's nephew, printed it from a copy in More's own hand, written about 1513; this authentic version stops short on the eve of Buckingham's rebellion. Rastell in his edition inserted some passages which were 'not written by Master More in this history written by him in English, but are translated out of this history, which he wrote in Latin'. In 1566 the Latin version was included in the collected edition of More's Latin works. The English and Latin versions present some differences. Yet Dr. Gairdner, remarking that 'they have very much the appearance of proceeding from the same hand', observes that 'if the one version was a translation of the other, it is hard to say which is the original'.³ Sir John Harington in 1596 described it as 'written as I have heard by Morton, but as most suppose by Sir Thomas More'.⁴ Sir George Buck, somewhat later, says

¹ The reproductions in Strutt's Manners and Customs do not do them justice. A better edition is in preparation by Mr. Emery Walker.

² Ed. Ellis, pp. 467-524.

³ Engl. Hist. Rev. vi. 446.

⁴ Metamorphosis of Ajax, p. 46.

that Archbishop Morton wrote 'a book in Latin against King Richard, which afterwards came into the hands of Mr. More, sometime his servant'.¹ Sir Henry Ellis² suggested that the English version was the work of Morton, pointing to a statement in Grafton's copy with reference to the last sickness of Edward IV: 'as I myself that wrote this pamphlet truly know;'³ this remark does not, however, appear in Rastell's more authentic text, and was possibly an interpolation by Grafton, who also added a conclusion to the whole work. Dr. Gairdner would on the other hand be disposed to favour a 'theory that the Latin was by Morton, and that More translated it into English, but that the Latin, as we have it at all events, bears quite as distinct evidence as the other of having been written in Henry VIII's reign, long after Morton's death'. He considers that as they stand neither the Latin nor the English could have been written by Morton, but that Morton had supplied the material on which it is based cannot be questioned. 'To Morton is alike due the minuteness and the partiality of More's picturesque and most interesting narrative.'⁴ Sir Clements Markham⁵ has argued that More had no share in the Life, and simply made an imperfect copy for his own use; but part of this argument rests on the interpolation as to the death-bed of Edward IV above referred to, which cannot be alleged against More. Most recently Mr. Charles Whibley has described the ascription to More as resting on hazardous authority. 'The book itself does not chime with the character and temper of More. It is marked throughout by an asperity of tone, an eager partisanship, which belong more obviously to Morton than to the humane author of Utopia.'⁶ Mr. Whibley, however, admits that the case is not one which admits of dogmatism. In this admission all must, I think, concur. Notwithstanding, it must be accepted that, whosoever was the hand which put it into shape, much of the material can have come, whether directly

¹ Buck, Life of Richard III, ap. Kennet.

² Hardyng, Chronicle, p. xx.

³ Id. p. 470.

⁴ Engl. Hist. Rev. vi. 446; Gairdner, Richard III, p. 86.

⁵ Richard III, pp. 169-71.

⁶ Cambridge History of English Literature, iii. 334; I do not understand that Mr. Whibley would reject the possibility of More's responsibility for the Englishing of the History of Richard III.

or indirectly, from Morton alone: and that if the Latin version is in point of style unequal to More's authentic Latin works, the longer English version is for its vigour and eloquence not unworthy of him. As a matter of convenience I shall refer to the English Life in Rastell's version by the name of More.

Grafton's version of the Life has no ascription of authorship, but it was manifestly derived from a copy of the English work afterwards published by Rastell. There are, however, changes of diction and arrangement which are not for the better. The opening passage of More's copy, wherein he gives the fortunes of the daughters of Edward IV, was probably written after the death of the Lady Bridget, who died before 1513, and whilst Thomas Howard (husband of the Lady Anne), who became Duke of Norfolk in 1524, was still Earl of Surrey, a title which he received in 1514. The corresponding passage in Grafton's version¹ was probably written after the death of Edward's seventh daughter, Catherine, Countess of Devonshire, in 1527. Similarly More's copy was written whilst Jane Shore was still alive;² but Grafton refers to her death in 1526-7.³ Grafton again speaks by name of Lord Howard, and his son Thomas, afterwards second Duke of Norfolk, as rendering services to Richard III,⁴ where More (with cautious regard for the living) has only 'another lord' or 'a knight';⁵ these changes are likely to have been made after Norfolk's death in 1524. Grafton has added, amongst other matters, all the stories of Jane Shore's intrigue with Hastings, and calls her 'a vile strumpet'⁶; whilst More refers to her with a kindly reticence for one who was still alive and had experienced great changes of fortune. On the other hand, three passages,⁷ which Rastell supplied from the Latin, have nothing to correspond in Grafton. There is a story of how a London citizen dwelling in Redcross Street, on hearing of the death of Edward IV, foretold that Gloucester would be King. More (with obvious reference to the man's character) says 'he was not likely to speak it of nought'; and adds 'this have I by credible information learned'.⁸ In the Latin

¹ p. 472.

⁴ pp. 488, 496, 498.

⁷ pp. 37, 41, 79.

² Ed. Lumby, p. 54.

⁵ pp. 35, 49, 53.

⁸ p. 7.

³ p. 499.

⁶ pp. 496, 498, 499, 509.

version¹ the author relates that he remembered the conversation being reported to his father, by one who overheard it, when there was yet no suspicion of how it would turn out. More was at the time only a little over five years old, but there is nothing impossible in such a recollection by a precocious child. At all events this story cannot be Morton's. It might be More's, whose father then lived in Milk Street, at no great distance from Redcross Street, and in the same ward of Cripplegate. Grafton² tells this story with two notable variations; he omits 'this have I by credible information learned', and ends 'of all likelihood he spake it not of nought'; thus destroying the personal character of the story.

The History stops short in the Latin version at the coronation of Richard III,³ and in the English in the midst of Morton's colloquy with Buckingham.⁴ This may perhaps indicate that after translating his Latin History of Edward V the author began an English continuation, which he never finished. Grafton added a continuation to the end of Richard's reign, which as a literary work is altogether inferior; for his facts he is chiefly indebted to Polydore Vergil. The English version is clearly an unrevised fragment, which was intended to be continued into the reign of Henry VII.⁵ Dates are at some places left blank,⁶ and there are some small errors,⁷ such as calling Hastings Richard instead of William. These points were corrected by Grafton. But apart from such matters the English version fully deserves the judgement which Hallam⁸ passed on it as 'the first example of good English language; pure and perspicuous, well-chosen, without vulgarisms or pedantry'. Similarly Mr. Whibley praises it for its sense of proportion, its freedom from flamboyancy or repetition, and a style marked by strict economy of words and preference for English.⁹ The account of Jane Shore is commended by Hallam as 'a model of elegant narration'. The discourse on the abuses of sanctuary,¹⁰ which is put into the mouth of

¹ f. 45 b, ed. 1566.

³ p. 80 of English Text.

⁶ pp. 45, 65.

² p. 474.

⁴ p. 91.

⁷ pp. 8, 20.

⁵ p. 81.

⁸ Literature of Europe, i. 454; see also Bridgett, Life of More, p. 79: 'the English is beautiful'.

⁹ Cambridge History of English Literature, iii. 335.

¹⁰ pp. 27-31.

Buckingham, is hardly less noteworthy both for matter and form; here at all events we have something of which More is not unlike to have been the author. But the merit of the History of Richard III does not consist solely in the literary distinction of the English version. In it for the first time in our literature we have 'a history which is not a mere collection of facts, but a deliberately designed and carefully finished whole'. From its composition 'our art of history must date its beginning'.¹ One need only modify this criticism by adding that the History of Richard III was but the most notable expression of a spirit which was in the air. It was in 1513-14, just before the English version was written, that the 'Translator of Livius' compiled The First English Life of Henry the Fifth. If the latter falls short in achievement, the conscious desire of the author to write in homely English, and his sense of what was needed in an historian, are of a quality to entitle it to be coupled in the second place with the History.

As an historical authority the History of Richard III must of course be used with caution, and with due regard to the character of the source from which it was derived. Its judgments on Edward IV (not unfavourable) and on Richard III, as well as on minor actors, were no doubt inspired by Morton, who was also clearly the informant for the scene at the arrest of Hastings and for his own negotiations with Buckingham. Other incidents of events in London, as before suggested, might have been learned by More from his father Sir John More, who in the reign of Richard III was already a lawyer of repute. But even in those matters which are derived from other sources the narrative, whether More's or not, is likely to have been coloured by the opinions of Morton, under whose influence it was certainly composed. Morton himself had of course no reason to speak well of Richard III, but he was a man to whose high character More bears witness in *Utopia*² as one who was not more honourable for his authority than for his prudence and virtue. It is not inapposite to the present matter that More speaks also of Morton's polished and effective utterance,³ incomparable wit, and memory of wonderful excellence.

¹ Mr. Whibley, u.s.

² Ed. Lupton, pp. 41, 42.

³ 'Sermo politus et efficax.'

Another contemporary,¹ who was not too friendly, wrote of Morton as 'a man worthy of memory for his many great acts and specially for his great wisdom . . . in our time there was no man like to be compared with him in all things'. Still, even such a man could not rid himself of bias about events in which he had played so great a part, and his story must be weighed accordingly. But with all such allowance the History as it stands is a crushing condemnation of Richard III; we may extenuate it in some degree, but we cannot reject altogether the narrative which has come down to us with such weighty authority. As regards More's possible share in the work, it does not seem unreasonable to suppose that as one of his first works he should have amplified and given an English dress to the material obtained from the early patron of whom he preserved so high an opinion. Nor would it under such circumstances be unnatural that he should have been careful to reproduce faithfully the opinions which he had heard or found recorded. On this theory we cannot, it is true, claim for the History any added authority from the weight of More's name. Neither, on the other hand, can we press any argument against his share in the authorship, which rests on the apparent incompatibility of its sentiments with More's own temperament.

The History of Richard III has brought us across the threshold of a new era in historical literature, and would thus be an apt conclusion to this review of the histories of the fifteenth century. But there is another work which, like the History, belongs in form to the next age, though in its substance it preserves material of older derivation. The Anglica Historia of Polydore Vergil down at all events to 1461 was a secondary compilation, but from that point it begins to assume something of the quality of an original authority. Of its general character and literary importance I shall write more at large in the final chapter. But with its particular value for the Yorkist period it will be convenient to deal briefly here. In his narrative for the earlier years of Edward IV Vergil has incorporated some touches of traditional scandal, such as the story that the King's quarrel with Warwick originated in his attempt on the honour of a lady of the King-maker's house,¹ a supposed incident of which Lytton made use in The Last of the Barons. He is not always accurate in small details, as when he states that John Neville was made Marquis of Montagu in 1461² (instead of in 1470), and when he refers to the defeat of the Lincolnshire Rebellion as the battle of Edgcote.³ It is more serious when he adopts, probably from a French source, the Lancastrian story of the murder of Edward, son of Henry VI, after the battle of Tewkesbury; ⁴ it was probably due to Vergil's authority that the allegation obtained such long currency. Of the death of Henry VI, Vergil states that the continual report is that Richard of Gloucester killed him with a sword.⁵

¹ Chronicles of London, p. 232. Sir C. Markham (Richard III, pp. 206-7) stigmatizes Morton as 'an incorrigible plotter' and 'an odious instrument of extortion'. On any view such criticism seems overdone and calculated to defeat itself.

Polydore Vergil of course wrote under Tudor influence. But for that very reason more authentic interest attaches to his stories of the early life of Henry VII; of how Henry VI in 1470 had foretold his future destiny as one to whom 'both we and our adversaries must yield'; of how he escaped into Brittany with his uncle Jasper, Earl of Pembroke; and of his peril in that country from the emissaries of Edward IV.⁶ All this it is very possible that Polydore may have learnt from Henry himself. For the reign of Richard III it is natural that the quality of Polydore's information should improve, and the strength of his prejudice increase. From the death of Edward IV to the outbreak of Buckingham's rebellion the narrative shows a general resemblance to that given in the History of Richard III; it is noteworthy that Polydore was on friendly terms with More. Of the latter part of Richard's reign Polydore has given an account of great original value. It is of course prejudiced and partial, but it is clearly written by one who had access to good information about the plans

¹ English Translation, p. 117.

² Id. p. 113.

³ Id. p. 128.

⁴ Id. p. 152; the story was current in France at an early date, cf. La Chronique scandaleuse, ii. 77, ed. B. de Mandrot, Soc. Hist. France. As to other accounts see pp. 172 above and 376-7 below.

⁵ English Translation, p. 156. See pp. 175, 181, 185 above.

⁶ Id. pp. 134, 155, 164-5.

and movements of Henry Tudor during the two years before the battle of Bosworth. As is natural, the account of the schemes of the exiled Prince and his adherents is better than that of events in England. For the former the author was able to obtain his material, not only from Henry himself, at whose request he wrote, but also from men like Richard Foxe and Christopher Urswick, with the first of whom at all events he was well acquainted. But the material which he would have obtained from such sources as to events in England, and even as to the details of the conspiracy amongst Henry's friends at home, would of necessity be secondhand and less complete. Much of it therefore represents only the popular opinion current in the early Tudor period. Polydore Vergil's Anglica Historia did not appear till 1534, but he had begun to collect his material much earlier, within a few years of his first coming to England in 1502. So he may have known many persons who were familiar with the events of 1483 to 1485, and his history was avowedly written in part from the testimony of such persons.¹

¹ English Translation, p. 183; cf. Transactions of Royal Historical Society, 2nd Series, xvi. 11.

CHAPTER VIII

CORRESPONDENCE: PRIVATE AND OFFICIAL

THE letters of private individuals are among the most fruitful and faithful sources for social history, and when they touch upon public affairs for political history also. They are, moreover, a form of literature which at its best possesses a singular charm. But letter-writing as a literary art is a product of an advanced state of culture, which we must not look for in the ordinary correspondence of the fifteenth century, though we may meet with freshness and spontaneity of statement even in unexpected quarters. On the other hand, the historical information to be derived from such private correspondence as has survived is of greater moment for the period with which we are concerned than it would be for a later age. This is due partly to the dearth of other material; but partly also to the circumstances of the time. Official letters and documents are numerous enough at an earlier period, and have their natural value as revealing the intentions and ideas of their writers. But it is in the fifteenth century that letters of less deliberate import begin first to fill any large place in the raw material of our English history. Not the least reason for this is the position which the native speech of England was asserting for itself as the ordinary means of written communication. When people set down their opinions and impressions in the language of everyday life, the result became naturally less studied and the criticism more spontaneous, with a corresponding increase of advantage to us. Official documents are in their essence written for a purpose, and, whatever value they may possess, are inevitably prejudiced and to be used with caution, except in so far as they are records of fact. But for the historian private letters which deal in any degree with public affairs have another and greater value. When, as is often the case, allusions to public events are simply incidental, they are reasonably free from prejudice; and even when they are coloured by the prepossessions of the writers, they reflect not the bias or ulterior aim of the politician or statesman, but the opinion or criticism of the outside observer. Thus they have a frankness which is not to be looked for in more carefully drafted documents. Though we must not seek in them for large views or broad narratives, they are invaluable as a record of small facts and details which will often explain and correct the more general statements to be found elsewhere. It must be remembered also that, when there were no journals or public newsmongers, the correspondence of private persons dealt more with politics and public events; not a few, for instance, of the Paston Letters were written for the sole purpose of supplying the recipient with the latest information on politics or matters of public interest.

It is with the correspondence of private individuals that this chapter will be primarily concerned. But apart from formal official documents and state papers there comes a class of letters written by officials and politicians in their public capacity, whether to report facts or to convey opinions and advice. Such letters are increasingly numerous during the fifteenth century. They stand on a somewhat different footing to the record or state-paper properly so called, and in their character approximate in a greater or less degree to the correspondence of private individuals. I shall therefore include in my review such collections of public correspondence as are readily available.

Dr. Gairdner¹ remarks of the Paston Letters: 'The first thing which strikes the most casual observer is the testimony they afford to the state of education among the people at the period in which they were written. From the extreme scarcity of original letters of such an early date we are too easily led to undervalue the culture and civilization of the age. But the standard of education was by no means so low, and its advantages by no means so exceptionally distributed as might be otherwise supposed. No person of any rank or station in society above mere labouring men seems to have been wholly illiterate. All could write letters: most persons could express themselves in writing with ease and fluency.' It is peculiar, as Dr. Gairdner further observes, that the nobility were the worst writers: he calls their spelling and handwriting alike outrageous. However, this was written without reference to the fantastic spelling and grammar of the Cely Papers. The Paston Letters belong chiefly to the middle and end of the century; but similar observations would be true, though to a more limited extent, of the earlier years.

¹ Paston Letters, i. 318.

Our sources for the history of the fifteenth century in England are often so obscure, and for the most part so fragmentary, that we are apt to transfer to the age itself the difficulties which we encounter, forgetting that the forces which were to produce the Renaissance were already at work, and indeed beginning to bear fruit. However dark the century may have been politically, it was certainly not barren educationally, nor even wholly so in literature. There was in truth an earnest desire for educational progress, of which the great foundations of Henry VI were only the crown. We need not take too literally the lamentable assertion of William Bingham,¹ that 'the grammar schools, which used to be flourishing and numerous, had decayed for want of masters, and that the faculty of grammar was much neglected both in the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge and in the country generally, whereby not merely was the knowledge of sacred scripture and the Latin requisite for the pursuit of the law and the affairs of the realm likely to perish, but also the power of communicating with foreigners'. These were the considerations which moved Bingham to found Clare Hall at Cambridge; we may accept his design as proof of the demand for education, and his reasons as evidence of the inroads which the native English was making on Latin as the principal medium of written communications. The use of French, which had been common enough in previous centuries, was also decaying, and even in the reign of Henry V the fact that Richard Beauchamp, Earl of Warwick, could speak French fluently was regarded as something of an accomplishment, and was no doubt one reason for his constant employment as a diplomatist. That the demand for education was not confined to the upper classes is shown by such incidents as the foundation in 1445 of four grammar schools in London, where there were already a number of similar institutions.¹ That the spread of education should have been more or less coterminous with the rapid development of the English language is not unnatural: the one was no doubt both a cause and an effect of the other. I think it may be claimed that the private correspondence of the age reflects both of these phenomena. It is true that the Stonor Correspondence includes a few English letters which date from the fourteenth century. Such instances are, however, rare. At the beginning of the fifteenth century letters in Latin or Anglo-French are more usual, at all events in documents of a semi-official character. Long before its middle not only private individuals, but also politicians and statesmen habitually corresponded with one another in their native tongue. The use of Latin or French was then restricted for the most part to foreign diplomacy. We even find Charles the Bold writing to Lord Wenlock, the governor of Calais, in English and with his own hand.²

¹ Cal. Patent Rolls, Henry VI, iii. 295.

The spread of education and the development of the mother-tongue, to which the correspondence of the age bears witness, explain the increasing interest which was taken in the reading of histories, and also the growing disuse of Latin as their medium. Paradoxical though it may appear, it is not unreasonable to attribute to the same causes the dearth of good literary narratives; the one instrument had decayed before the other was perfected.

From these general observations I pass to a review of the principal collections of letters, private or semi-official, which are readily accessible. The Paston Letters, both for their celebrity and their own intrinsic importance, claim the first place. From them also can best be illustrated the significance of such material for the political and social history of the period. It will be sufficient to indicate briefly the general character of other collections of private letters without entering into detail. Of the principal collections of semi-official correspondence it will be necessary to treat at more length, and so far as may be in chronological order. In conclusion I will give such account as is possible of isolated letters scattered in various quarters.

¹ For the common foundation of schools elsewhere see Leach, Educational Charters, pp. xxxvii, xxxviii.

² Kirk, Charles the Bold, ii. 70.

The *Paston Letters*¹ do not begin to be of value till about the end of the first third of the century. They include only a few documents of any note earlier than 1440, in which year the first private letter of interest for public affairs is addressed to John Paston. To John Paston's happy propensity for keeping letters and documents, even when their writers had urgently requested that they should be burnt as soon as read, we owe the preservation of the family correspondence. The letters, which had lain in fortunate neglect for over two centuries, first attracted attention nearly two hundred years ago. When, after various vicissitudes, they were at length printed, the originals vanished so completely that an ingenious critic doubted whether they had ever existed. The second Earl of Yarmouth, who was the last male heir of the Pastons, had sold some of his family papers to Peter Le Neve, the antiquary, who died in 1729. Le Neve's collections came into the possession of another antiquary, Tom Martin, who married his friend's widow. After the death of the Earl of Yarmouth in 1732, others of his family papers were acquired by Francis Blomefield, who used them for his History of Norfolk. Blomefield died in 1762, and Martin nine years later. Of the Paston papers owned by Blomefield a part found their way to the Bodleian Library. Martin's collections were eventually purchased by Sir John Fenn, who in 1787 printed a selection in two volumes and presented the originals to George III. In 1789 Fenn published two more volumes, and in 1825 a fifth volume was edited from Fenn's transcripts by his nephew, William Frere. The originals were all lost sight of till the discovery in 1865 of those comprised in the fifth volume, together with some unprinted documents. It was this discovery which suggested to Dr. Gairdner his first re-edition of the Paston Letters. That edition was almost complete, when in

¹ I need hardly say that in the following account of the history and contents of the Paston Letters I am much indebted to Dr. Gairdner's invaluable Introduction. For a few additional letters relating to the Paston family see Hist. MSS. Comm. 12th Report, App. iv, vol. i, pp. 10-13; Manuscripts of the Duke of Rutland, see p. 393 n. below.

1875 the originals of the third and fourth volumes, together with ninety-five new letters, were found in the possession of a member of the Frere family. The whole of this part of the Paston papers is now at the British Museum.¹ Some other documents are amongst the Phillipps manuscripts at Cheltenham. It was not till 1889 that the originals of Fenn's first two volumes were found in the library of Mr. E. G. Pretyman at Orwell Hall, to which they had come with the papers of Bishop Tomline, the tutor and biographer of William Pitt. Since the recovery of the complete originals the whole collection, with many fresh documents, has again been re-edited by Dr. Gairdner.²

From the history of the Letters I go back to the history of the family. The Pastons, though alleged by their enemies in the fifteenth century to have been bondmen by descent, were apparently hard-working yeomen in Norfolk till the time of Clement Paston in the reign of Richard II. Clement educated his son William to the law; and William, who rose to be a judge of the Common Pleas in 1429, established the fortunes of his family by marrying an heiress, Agnes, daughter of Sir Edmund Berry. William Paston, who was a man of high repute in his profession and native county, died in 1444. He had made it one of his aims to obtain for his family a position as landed gentry. His design was continued by his son John Paston, the eldest, who was bred like his father to the law and like him married a lady, Margaret Mauteby, of good estate and sage ability. John Paston, the eldest, though he never attained to his father's professional distinction, was a gentleman of position, with a wide circle of political acquaintance. Like his father he had a large family, but we are concerned only with the two elder sons, both called John. The first, who was knighted as soon as he came of age in 1463, lived much at Court and in good society till his death in 1479. The second, who was also knighted under Henry VII, survived till 1503, and was ancestor of the later family, of which the head, Sir Robert Paston, was created Earl of Yarmouth in the reign of

¹ Additional MSS. 27443-6 (Fenn, vol. v), 34888-9 (Fenn, vols. iii and iv).

² In six volumes; the first contains the Introduction. The references in the footnotes below are to the numbers of the Letters.

Charles II. With the death of the second Earl in 1732 the male line became extinct.

William Paston, the judge, is of little interest in the present connexion, except as founder of the family. The few documents relating to his lifetime deal chiefly with his private affairs, and in particular with his disputes with 'this cursed bishop for Bromholm, Aslak for Sprouston, and Julian Herberd for Thornham'. His widow survived till 1478. It is round their eldest son, the first John Paston, that the main historical interest of the Letters centres from 1440 till his death in 1466. John had, as before observed, a wide political acquaintance; he was a cold, shrewd man, intent on the advancement of his family, and trusted by others as a good worldly adviser and agent. It was no doubt his business-like character that made him such a careful keeper of papers. The next generation continued the practice: but of the whole collection three-fifths belong to the five-and-twenty years of his active life.

The correspondence of a private family would naturally be most illustrative of social history, but John Paston's affairs and acquaintance have given to his papers a more than incidental importance for politics as well. His wife was a cousin of the famous Sir John Fastolf, with whom he was at an early date brought into close connexion. Fastolf, who was himself a sharp man of business, put much trust in John Paston; when he died in 1459 he made Paston one of his executors, and left him all his Norfolk and Suffolk estates subject to trust for the foundation of a College in his Castle of Caister. Paston's claims to the estates were disputed by influential rivals. His endeavours to maintain them and to discharge his trust embroiled him and his sons in the stormy politics of the time. It was the relationship of the family to Fastolf whilst he was alive, and their claims to his estates when he was dead, which chiefly imparted to their correspondence more than a private and social interest. At the same time John Paston himself, though not actively concerned in politics, seems to have followed closely the public events of the troubled years in which he lived. No man of good estate could escape from difficulties in his private affairs during such a stormy time, when all private disputes were drawn inevitably into the vortex of politics. Immediately after his father's death John Paston had to defend the possession of one of his manors against Lord Molyne. Molyne had for his representatives in Norfolk a lawyer called John Heydon, and Sir Thomas Tuddenham, who during the ministry of the Duke of Suffolk were all-powerful in the country. Suffolk himself was of such importance in eastern England that his fortunes and fate could not fail, for good or ill, to concern his neighbours. Thomas Daniel, another of the unpopular ministers, was also an intermeddler in Norfolk; whilst Fastolf, even in his old age, was a man of too much wealth and importance to keep clear of public affairs. One of Fastolf's men of business was William Worcester, or Botoner, the Annalist. Worcester was a frequent correspondent with Paston; it is to the news-letters sent by him and other writers of less note, like William Lomnour, James Gresham, John Bocking, and Friar Brackley, that we are indebted for the most valuable historical information which the collection contains. Though the Letters were for the most part written to or by members of the Paston family, there are included amongst them many of Fastolf's papers, together with a certain number of documents of more public importance. Dr. Gairdner has also added a few other documents which, though not part of the original collection, are related to it more or less closely.

John Paston began to keep his letters as a lad at Trinity Hall, Cambridge. One of the first documents of public interest in the collection is a news-letter¹ written to him in 1440, when he was only nineteen. But political interest really begins during the ministry of Suffolk about 1447, when Edmund Paston, his younger brother, writes to him: ² 'He enquired of me of the rule of my master Daniel and my lord of Suffolk, and asked which I thought should rule in this shire; and I said, both as I trow, and he that surviveth to hold by the virtue of the survivor, and he to thank his friends and acquit his enemies.' It is of course in the light thrown by such incidental allusions that the historical value of the Letters most commonly consists. But greater events bring more detailed narratives, and the interest widens as Suffolk's fall approaches. The articles of Suffolk's impeachment concerned John Paston enough to make him preserve a copy.¹ But though the family had suffered at the hands of the duke's agents,² their interest in him is for a neighbour rather than for a possible powerful foe. Margaret Paston writes to her husband on March 12, 1450, that the duke is pardoned, and 'is right well at ease and merry';³ though in the same letter she makes complaint of the ill sea-keeping which was one of the grievances of dwellers near the coast at this time. When we come to Suffolk's tragic end the reference is entirely sympathetic. Chance brought into Paston's hands a copy of the farewell letter⁴ which the duke addressed to his son before his departure from England on April 30. It is one of the most pathetic that could be imagined, and Lingard wrote well of it: 'it is difficult to believe that the writer could have been either a false subject or a bad man.' Less than a week later William Lomnour sent Paston, in 'a little bill so washed with sorrowful tears that hardly shall ye read it', the news of how Suffolk had been taken on the sea and drawn out of the great ship into a little boat, where one of the lewdest of the crew took a rusty sword and smote off his head with half a dozen strokes.⁵ Jack Cade's rebellion followed swift on Suffolk's fall; Sir John Fastolf had his share in the danger, and had to furnish his place in Southwark with his old soldiers of Normandy and habiliments of war. Many years afterwards one of Fastolf's men appealed to Paston for help in seeking to recover his losses, and gave him a narrative of the troubles; his life had only been saved by the aid of Cade's sword-bearer, Robert Poynings, who was husband of Paston's sister Elizabeth.⁶ We see in this incident how Cade's rebellion was no mere peasant rising, but a political movement in which men of position took part.

¹ No. 36.

² No. 69.

The correspondence of the next dozen years teems with political allusions. In Norfolk John Paston was still troubled with the enmity of Heydon and Tuddenham. This may have influenced his political opinions, and he was of sufficient importance in the county to be courted by the Duke of Norfolk on the Yorkist side.

¹ No. 101.² Cf. vol. i, p. 132.³ No. 106.⁴ No. 117.⁵ No. 120.⁶ No. 126.

Of the political position at the time of the King's first illness in January 1454, we have an interesting record in a news-letter, which, though not really part of the Paston papers, has been well inserted by Dr. Gairdner.¹ The Queen and the Duke of Buckingham had tried in vain to arouse the King's interest in his little son: but 'without any answer or countenance, saving only that once he looked on the Prince and cast down his eyes again'. The Lancastrian lords were making ready. The Queen had made a bill of five articles, desiring to have the whole rule of the land. York and his supporters were expected in London. 'Every man that is of the opinion of the Duke of Somerset maketh him ready to be as strong as he can make him;' and the duke himself has 'spies going in every lord's house of the land'. In the midst of these troubles Margaret Paston could nevertheless write to her husband, bidding him help his sister to marry the 'gentleman of her choice', and 'remember to purvey a thing for my neck and to do make my girdle'.² Yet other persons have stories of riotous fellowships and beatings and violence in Norfolk, which show how weak the government had grown.³ In the summer Worcester sends John Paston news of the movements of the Yorkist lords, of the provision for keeping the sea, and of the 'stately vessell, only for the war, that is made new at Bristol by the mayor, called Sturmyrn'.⁴ At the same time William Paston sends word that 'the Duke of Somerset is still in prison—in worse case than he was'.⁵

The year 1454 was one of doubt and anxiety. But early in the next January a correspondent sends John Paston news that the King was well-amended, had recognized his son, and spoken to his lords as well as ever he did, had said that he was in charity with all the world, and so he would all others were.⁶ However, Henry's recovery led directly to the restoration of Somerset, to the outbreak of war, and to the first

¹ No. 235; it comes from Egerton MS. 914.
Nos. 238-41.

⁴ No. 249.

⁵ No. 254.

² No. 236.

⁶ No. 270.

battle of St. Albans. Dr. Gairdner inserts a valuable document descriptive of the battle.¹ Paston had his own news of it in a brief note written three days later, with a report of those who had been slain.² A correspondent of Worcester's supplied him soon after with a review of the political position in the capital, whilst in July Worcester himself wrote to Paston that his brother-in-law, Poynings, was quit of all treason, and that the process against Sir William Oldhall, another Yorkist, had been reversed.³ Other letters of about the same time have news of proceedings in Parliament, and of fighting and rumours of fighting.⁴

It is possible to trace the course of events during 1454-5 with tolerable fullness in the Paston Letters, and much of the information afforded is invaluable. But we cannot expect the same completeness to continue, and this is not the place in which to piece out the long gaps which we encounter during the next few years. So I must be content to note only a few isolated matters. A good many papers of this time relate to Fastolf's affairs, and came into Paston's possession as executor. In February 1456 one of Fastolf's servants reports to his master on events in London: 'York was come that day to the Parliament in good array; "the King, as it was told me by a great man, would have him for chief and principal councillor"; men speak and divine much; "and the Lords spoken this day in Parliament of a great gleaming star," which was, I suppose, Halley's Comet; "The Queen is a great and strong laboured woman, for she spareth no pain to sue her things to an intent and conclusion to her power.'⁵ The usefulness of such contemporary talk and criticism requires no comment. During this same year John Bocking sent Paston a series of letters, which are of great value for tracing the movements of the King and Queen, and the lords of the rival parties.⁶ Then we have a gap of nearly two years, with little of public interest. In February 1458 Worcester writes to Fastolf with an account of the assembly of the lords in London.⁷ Bocking reports soon after how Warwick

¹ No. 283: it really belongs to the Stonor Correspondence.

² No. 285.

³ Nos. 287, 297.

⁴ Nos. 299, 301, 303.

⁵ No. 322.

⁶ Nos. 330, 331, 334, 345.

⁷ No. 364.

had been commissioned to keep the sea.¹ John Jerningham, who was a cousin of Margaret Paston, served on Warwick's fleet, and wrote to her in June with the news of their victory off Calais.² The next year was made eventful for the Paston family by the death of Fastolf; to them no doubt that overshadowed all else.

At the close of 1459 a great political crisis was approaching. On its issue Paston's fortunes in the matter of the Fastolf inheritance seemed likely to depend, and Paston's correspondents had much to tell. Worcester wrote sarcastically in January 1460 of how the Lord Rivers, Sir Antony his son, and others had won Calais by a feeble assault made at Sandwich by Denham, a squire.³ The Woodvilles were at this time Lancastrian, and had been sent to attack Warwick at Calais, but were themselves surprised by the Yorkists at Sandwich. William Paston, reporting the news more accurately, describes how when the Woodvilles were brought to Calais they were rated in turn by the Earls of Salisbury and Warwick, 'and in likewise by my Lord of March;'⁴ it must have been a strange scene for Edward IV to look back upon, when he had married Rivers's daughter and Antony Woodville's sister. During the remainder of the year the letters of Friar Brackley and others mix together politics and the affairs of Fastolf's estate. In December came the defeat and death of York at Wakefield, followed by the march of the Lancastrians to St. Albans. Clement Paston writes to his brother urging him 'to come with more men and cleaner arrayed than any other man of your country'. . . . 'Every man is well willing to go with my Lords here, and I hope God shall help them, for the people in the north rob and steal, and be appointed to pillage all this country.'⁵ At this time the Paston family were Yorkist, and three months later William announces joyfully that 'our sovereign Lord hath won the field at Towton'. 'We send no sooner unto you, because we had nothing certain until now: for unto this day London was as sorry a city as might be.'⁶

¹ No. 366.² No. 369.³ No. 399.⁴ No. 400.⁵ No. 430.⁶ No. 450; cf. the poem The Rose of Rouen, quoted on p. 247 below.

If Paston relied on the success of York for the advancement of his own affairs he was bitterly disappointed. He soon learnt how small profit men of moderate estate can derive from violent political changes, and found that he had only exchanged one set of influential rivals for another. Not that at first he had any reason to anticipate ill consequences for himself. He stood well with the new King, had become since Fastolf's death a man of much greater local importance, and was a knight of the shire for Norfolk in Edward's first Parliament. But his election involved him in a dispute with Sir John Howard, a kinsman of the Duke of Norfolk, and himself afterwards the first duke of the later line. This dispute was complicated by the claims of his rivals to the Fastolf estates, in which Howard and Norfolk acquired some share. Others of Paston's manors were disputed by the Duke of Suffolk, the Yorkist son of a Lancastrian sire, now married to the new King's sister. With so many powerful enemies it is perhaps not surprising that during the last six years of his life John Paston found himself three times a prisoner in the Fleet. He had enough to do to steer his family fortunes through the confusion of politics. The story of his troubles serves to illustrate the conflicting interests at Court during the first years of Edward IV. When he died in 1466 he left his sons an inheritance of great claims and much anxiety.

John Paston's eldest son had been knighted in 1463. He had lived much at Court, and vexed his parents by his expensive habits. Amongst his friends was Antony Woodville, through whose influence he now sought to help his own affairs. But good society and tournaments pleased Sir John more than dull business, so he did not make much progress. During the troubles of 1469 the Duke of Norfolk, pursuing his supposed claims to a share in the Fastolf property, laid formal siege to Paston's castle of Caister with an army of 3,000 men, and eventually compelled it to surrender. It is to the credit of Sir John and his mother that they seem to have been more concerned for the danger of their dependants than for their own property. This display of violence by a great lord, and the open waging of private war, enable us to judge how utterly ungoverned the kingdom was during the contest of Edward IV and Warwick. It was not much wonder that Sir John, and his next brother, John the youngest, supported the Lancastrian restoration, and fought on the losing side at Barnet. However, they soon got their pardons, and by the favour of Antony Woodville did something to restore the family fortunes. The letters for the next eight years, 1471-8, passed chiefly between the two brothers, who were confidential and lively correspondents. They are concerned for the most part with family affairs, notes of Court news, and of Sir John's doings at Calais, where he served for some time as one of the Council. Nevertheless, political allusions during the thirteen years from 1466 to 1479 are neither infrequent nor uninteresting. Sir John died in the latter year, and John the youngest, who then became head of the family, was a shrewd, sober man, more intent on his private business than on affairs of state. The letters for the last few years with which we have to deal relate chiefly to the former; but there are one or two documents of political importance for the reign of Richard III.¹

The foregoing pages will have served to show the importance of the Paston Letters for political history, and the light which they throw on the troubled and disturbed state of the time. But it is impossible to pass over altogether their value for a quieter side of social history. The principal characters themselves are interesting. John Paston the eldest, the sound man of business, somewhat hard and cold, eager to found a family. Margaret, the careful, wise, and prudent mother, feminine and practical, but withal human, helpful to her husband, strict but affectionate with her children. Sir John, the gay and extravagant man about town, constantly in financial difficulties, but not incapable if he exerted himself; possessed of some culture, with a taste for literature, he was a good writer of lively letters, who was none the less a keen soldier and jouster, and a loyal brother. Marriage was the main business of family life at the time, and there is much matchmaking, though money and not love is the thing first sought after. Judge Paston's daughter Elizabeth was anxious to get a husband, for at home she was the most part beaten once in the week or twice, and sometimes twice in one day, and her head broken in two or three places.¹ John Paston the youngest sought his brother's advice in a number of matrimonial projects before he got settled; sometimes one or two were on hand together; he made a love match in the end; the young lady was ardent, her mother favourable, bidding the lover remember that only a simple oak is cut at the first stroke; but the father was hard to satisfy over settlements. However, kindlier feelings were not wanting: when John Paston the eldest brought home his bride, his mother wrote to her husband, the Judge, to buy their new daughter a gown, 'in colour of a goodly blue or else of a bright sanguine.' The letters both of Agnes and of Margaret Paston are devoted chiefly to family affairs and estate management; but there are other homelier details; Agnes wants two pipes of gold; Margaret some dates and cinnamon as hastily as may be;² on another occasion it is a pound of almonds and a pound of sugar, and some frieze to make the child a gown; 'ye will have cheapest of Hay's wife, as it is told me; and buy a yard of black broad-cloth for a hood for me at three or four shillings a yard, for there is neither good cloth nor good frieze in this town; as for the child's gowns, and I have the stuff, I will make them.' This homely conclusion is in marked contrast to the first part of the same letter, in which Margaret asks her husband to get cross-bows and quarrels, for their house is 'so low that no man might shoot out with a long-bow, though we had never so much need'.³ In so careful a family the upbringing of the children and their starting in the world fills a large part. The letters about the younger sons at Eton and Oxford form a complete picture. Sir John Paston's youngest brother, William, wrote to him from school for a hose cloth, one for holidays, and another for workdays; and a stomacher and two shirts and a pair of slippers; more like a schoolboy he goes on to ask that 'I may come and sport me with you at London a day or two this term time'.⁴ William was a precocious youth, who a little later begged his brother to help him in his suit with a young gentlewoman, 'the age of her is by all likelihood eighteen or nineteen at the furthest.

¹ Nos. 994, 1001, 1002.

¹ No. 94.² No. 82.³ No. 88.⁴ No. 939.

And as for the money and plate, it is ready whensoever she were wedded, and as for her beauty judge you that when you see her, and specially behold her hands.' Master William winds up this serious letter with the announcement that he lacks nothing which Eton can teach but versifying 'which I trust to have with a little continuance', and sends his brother a bad enough specimen of 'mine own making'.¹ Walter, the next youngest, was then, in 1478-9, at Oxford, where his expenses for half a year were £6 5s. 5½d., and he was something in debt;² he excused himself to his brother for not having let him know the day that he was made Bachelor, but the letter had miscarried; however, he had already taken his degree, and given his feast in honour of it. 'I was promised venison against it of my Lady Harcourt, and of another man too, but I was deceived of both; but my guests hold them pleased with such meat as they had, blessed be God.'³

The Paston Letters are of course only a specimen of the correspondence of the time. Though few families can have been so circumstanced that they could have collected material of equal value for both political and social history, the Pastons were by no means exceptional. Isolated letters of a private kind are far from uncommon; it is the inevitable result of chance and time that has left so few collections of any size. Enough has, however, been said to illustrate the value and character of the private correspondence of the fifteenth century. There will therefore be no occasion to do more than give a general description of the other principal collections, and later on to indicate some of the places in which other private letters may be found.

The Stonor Letters are preserved in vol. xlvi of *Ancient Correspondence*⁴ at the Record Office. From this collection six letters were printed in Excerpta Historica.⁵ Two, which are reports written from London in June 1483 to Sir William Stonor by one Simon Stallworthe, are valuable for the history of the usurpation of Richard III. The other four are of less

¹ No. 942.

² No. 931.

³ No. 946.

⁴ There are 275 Letters and Documents in this volume.

⁵ pp. 16, 17, 354-6.

general interest, and are not even so important as many which remain unprinted. The Stonor family was an ancient one, settled at the place of the same name in Oxfordshire; by the fifteenth century they had acquired other good estates in Kent, Devonshire, and Cornwall. The most distinguished member of the family was John Stonor, who was Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas for more than twenty years under Edward III, and died in 1354. The collection begins with John Stonor's grandsons in the reign of Richard II, and includes some of the oldest private letters written in English, though most of the early documents are in Latin or in French. But the bulk of the correspondence centres round Thomas Stonor (d. 1474) and his son, Sir William Stonor (d. 1494). Sir William Stonor was implicated in Buckingham's rebellion in October 1483, and was in consequence attainted. Probably his papers were then seized; for the latest in date seems to be one in which Lord Lovell writes to Stonor from Lincoln, on October 11, 1483, asking for his support.¹ Thus Stonor's attainder will account for the preservation of his private correspondence. The political importance of the Stonor Letters is perhaps less than might have been expected from a family of such long standing and position. A few of the unprinted letters contain useful political references; but most of them relate to family affairs and business. Sir William Stonor, though a courtier and a gentleman, was actively concerned in the wool trade. The letters which passed between him, his first wife Elizabeth, and his stepson Thomas Bettson,² who was a merchant of the Staple at Calais, form the most interesting series in the collection; they range from 1475 to 1480. As is usual in the private correspondence of the time, litigation is a prominent subject. For the illustration of social life the collection is second in interest to the Paston Letters alone. Some of the documents appear to have gone astray; a good many Stonor papers appear in the Calendar of Ancient Deeds,³ and some in other volumes of Ancient Correspondence.⁴ A very valuable account of the

¹ Ancient Correspondence, xlv. 102.

² See Cely Papers, p. 72.

³ See especially vols. i, ii, and iii.

⁴ See xlv. 58, 64, 73, and perhaps li. 57, 71-4.

first battle of St. Albans, which was printed in Archaeologia,¹ and afterwards included by Dr. Gairdner in his edition of the Paston Letters,² comes from this collection.

The Plumpton Correspondence,³ which relates to an ancient family settled at a place of that name near Knaresborough in Yorkshire, is somewhat similar in character to the previous two collections. It finds its chief staple in family disputes and law-suits. Less than forty letters are of earlier date than 1485, and the great majority are of interest only for social history. The first document is a summons from Henry VI to Sir William Plumpton shortly before the battle of Towton.⁴ Two letters, written to Plumpton from London in 1466 and 1468, supply a little political information.⁵ Another mentions the Scottish invasion in September 1480,⁶ and a fourth contains some references to Buckingham's rebellion in 1483.⁷

The Cely Papers,⁸ which extend from 1475 to 1488, are the business correspondence of a family of London merchants and woolmongers. Naturally they are of most value for social and economic history. Incidentally they throw a good deal of light on commercial relations with Flanders, and on the keeping of Calais, where the Celys, as merchants of the Staple, had a place of business. There are some references to such political matters as affected business, as to fighting in the Low Countries and outside Calais, and to the embassy of the Prior of St. John (with whom the Celys had business relations) to France in 1480. Occasionally some political event seems to the writer to be of enough interest to be sent as 'tidings'; two such instances relate to the precautions taken against the Scottish invasion in 1480,⁹ and to the coming of a French embassy to England in 1482.¹⁰ But the only definitely political document is an extremely obscure memorandum

¹ Archaeologia, xx. 519. It cannot have been written by Sir William Stonor as there stated. Mr. Bayley, who edited it, said that it was contained in a small book, which formed part of the Stonor Papers. It is not included in Ancient Correspondence, xlii.

² No. 283.

³ Edited for the Camden Society by T. Stapleton in 1839.

⁴ Plumpton Correspondence, p. 1.

⁵ Id. pp. 16-20.

⁶ Id. p. 40.

⁷ Id. p. 45.

⁸ Edited for the Royal Historical Society by Mr. H. E. Malden in 1900; Camden 3rd Series, 1. The originals are in Ancient Correspondence, liii, at the Record Office.

⁹ Cely Papers, p. 55.

¹⁰ Id. pp. 89, 90.

written in June 1483, which clearly anticipates an untimely end for the little King Edward V.¹

The early letters in the first volume of *The Trevelyan Papers*² are of interest only as relating to Suffolk's unpopular colleague, John Trevilian. The volume also includes some prayers and hymns commemorative of Henry VI.³

The *Letters and Papers of John Shillingford*⁴ deal with a suit between the mayor and citizens of Exeter and Edmund Lacy, the bishop, between 1447 and 1450. They do not touch political history at all, so fall most conveniently under the head of private correspondence.

In turning to correspondence of an official or semi-official character it will be best to begin with collections covering the whole period; and then to deal with collections of a more limited range, as far as may be in their chronological order. Scattered amongst all such collections there will be found a certain number of letters of a more or less private character. On the other hand there are also many documents of a formal kind which would not strictly come under the head of correspondence. It is of course impossible to draw a sharp line between private and official correspondence, or between official correspondence and formal administrative documents.

The chief general collection of fifteenth-century letters is contained in the three series of Original Letters edited by Sir Henry Ellis. There are eighty-eight letters in all, of which about half belong to the reigns of Henry IV and Henry V. The most important group consists of fifteen letters in the second series,⁵ dealing with events in Wales during the first of these two reigns. They are nearly all of the semi-official order, and include some of the dispatches in Anglo-French, in which Henry of Monmouth reported to his father or to the Council the progress of his arms. These and some other letters from the Prince are to be found also in the Proceedings and Ordinances of the Privy Council; in the absence of any but desultory notices of the Welsh war, they are an indispensable authority, the more so since they enter into considerable

¹ Id. p. 132.

² Camden Society, 1st Series, 67, 1858.

³ The Trevelyan Papers, i. 53-60.

⁴ Edited for Camden Society, 2nd Series, in 1871, by Mr. Stuart Moore.

⁵ Original Letters, 2nd Series, i, Nos. 1-15.

detail. They are supplemented by other letters in Ellis's Collection, which were written by captains of castles and officials in Wales and the Marches. We get a vivid glimpse of the state of Wales at the height of Glendower's rebellion when in 1403 Richard Kingston concludes a formal French epistle to the King with an English postscript: 'For God's sake, my liege lord, think on yourself and your estate, or by my troth all is lost else: but and ye come yourself with haste all other will follow after. . . . And I cry you mercy, and put me in your high grace, for by my troth that I owe to you it is needful.' ¹ Of the other letters for the reign of Henry IV three are formal diplomatic letters in Latin. ²

Nearly thirty letters in Ellis's Collection belong to the reign of Henry V. ³ Many of them are of considerable importance. The majority are reports from officials to the King; a few are written by Henry himself. Of peculiar value are two from English agents in Germany in 1420. ⁴ Another small group deal with naval affairs and shipbuilding. ⁵ Of a different class is a private letter from a soldier in France to his friends in England, which gives the news of the camp at the time of Henry's abortive negotiations with the Dauphin in March 1419: 'Certes, all these ambassadors be double and false. Pray for us that we may come soon out of this unlusty soldier's life into the life of England.' ⁶ In Rymer's Foedera ⁷ there are two other letters of a similar character; one gives the camp gossip as to the causes of the failure of the English negotiations with Burgundy at the Conference of Meulan in June-July 1419; and the other, a year later, describes the marriage of Henry and Catherine of France at Troyes, and the siege of Sens.

For the reign of Henry VI Ellis gives twenty letters, ⁸ which are generally of no great importance. The most valuable are

¹ Original Letters, 2nd Series, i, No. 6. ² Id. 3rd Series, i, Nos. 22, 23, 25.

³ Id. 1st Series, i, Nos. 1-3; 2nd Series, i, Nos. 16-29; 3rd Series, i, Nos. 26-37. Of the last, No. 26, which is dated from Rouen on October 21, clearly belongs to 1418, and not to 1417, as given by Ellis; No. 32, which is undated, belongs to 1417.

⁴ Id. 2nd Series, i, No. 25; 3rd Series, i, No. 29.

⁵ Id. 2nd Series, i, No. 21; 3rd Series, i, No. 31.

⁶ Id. 2nd Series, i, No. 24.

⁷ ix. 789, 910; see also the Letter of John Albon noticed on p. 389 below.

⁸ Id. 1st Series, i, Nos. 4-7; 2nd Series, i, Nos. 30-40; 3rd Series, i, Nos. 33-7.

those dealing with the career of Richard of York,¹ and two Latin documents relating to the proposed intervention of Pope Pius II in 1460.² For the reign of Edward IV there are only ten letters;³ the chief are a valuable news-letter of 1462,⁴ and the Proclamation of Warwick and Clarence in 1470.⁵ There are fifteen letters for the reign of Richard III,⁶ all but two of which come from Harley MS. 433;⁷ several are of considerable political interest; the most valuable is one to John Russell, Bishop of Lincoln, from the King, in which Richard calls Buckingham 'the most untrue creature living'.⁸

The greater number of the letters in Ellis's Collection come from manuscripts in the British Museum, of which the chief are Cotton. Vespasian F iii and Vespasian F xiii. The letters given by Ellis are only a small selection. Many of the remainder are official letters of a formal type. Most of the important documents are included in the Proceedings and Ordinances of the Privy Council. Some of the earlier letters are printed in Fonblanque's Annals of the House of Percy.⁹ Others are still unprinted; two¹⁰ of particular interest are a report from Thomas Montacute, Earl of Salisbury, on May 21, 1421, as to the progress of the war; and a letter in which Richard Neville, Earl of Salisbury, apparently on March 7, 1455, with many protestations of loyalty, asks for the good offices of the Prior of Erdebury or Arbury, with Queen Margaret in the matter of the accusations against himself, the Earl of Warwick, and the Duke of York. The Welsh letters in Ellis's Collection come from Cotton. MS. Cleopatra F. iii, which contains papers of the Privy Council. Cotton. MSS. Cleopatra E ii and E iii, from which Ellis took a few letters, contain documents relating to ecclesiastical affairs. Others of the letters given by Ellis come from the transcripts made for Rymer's Foedera in Additional MSS. 4596-616. The proportion of early letters written in English is not nearly so great as would be suggested by the selection given by Ellis.

¹ Id. 1st Series, i, Nos. 5, 6, 7; 2nd Series, i, No. 40.

² Id. 3rd Series, i, Nos. 36, 37.

³ Id. 1st Series, i, Nos. 8, 9; 2nd Series, i, Nos. 41-6; 3rd Series, i, Nos. 38, 39. ⁴ Id. 1st Series, i, No. 8. ⁵ Id. 2nd Series, i, No. 42.

⁶ Id. 2nd Series, i, Nos. 47-54; 3rd Series, i, Nos. 40-6.

⁷ See p. 224 below. ⁸ Id. 2nd Series, i, No. 52; from the Record Office.

⁹ i. 209, 234-5, 519-29.

¹⁰ Vespasian F xiii, Arts. 46 and 64.

It is of course obvious that the contents of the volumes from which Ellis obtained most of his material belonged originally to the national archives. Other of the Cotton. Manuscripts are of a similar character, notably: Vespasian F vii, Cleopatra F iii and F iv, which contain papers of the Privy Council; Galba B i,¹ papers relating to Flanders; and Vespasian C xii, papers relating to Spain. Part also of Rymer's transcripts were obtained from Cotton. Manuscripts which perished in the great fire of 1731. It was from these and similar volumes that Sir Harris Nicolas was able to restore so much of the early Proceedings and Ordinances of the Privy Council. A general description of that collection does not fall within our subject, but attention must be directed to the large number of official and semi-official letters which it includes. These are most numerous for the reign of Henry IV; there are a fair number for the reign of Henry V, but comparatively few for the reign of Henry VI. In the first reign nearly all the letters are in Anglo-French; the only English one is from Edward of York in 1403.² Under Henry V the English letters are about equal in number to those in French; under Henry VI letters in French are the exception. The case is similar with minutes and other documents, of which the reign of Henry IV supplies only two instances in English;³ but afterwards the use of English increases gradually, till in the latter part of the reign of Henry VI it becomes predominant.

The first volume of Halliwell-Phillipps's Letters of the Kings of England is a much less important collection than that of Ellis. It contains over fifty letters relating to our period, but its usefulness is diminished by the translation into English of those which were written originally in French or Latin, and by the change of the English ones to modern spelling. Moreover, by far the greater number, and those the most important, are to be found in their authentic dress elsewhere: in the Collections of Ellis,⁴ and Delpit,⁵ in Nicolas's Proceedings of the Privy Council,⁶ in Davies's York Records,⁷

¹ See further, p. 220 below. ² Proceedings and Ordinances, i. 271.

³ Id. i. 322-7 (1410) and ii. 79 (1403).

⁴ Halliwell-Phillipps, i. 91, 92, 121-5, 130, 135.

⁵ Id. i. 83, 88, 90, 103.

⁶ Id. i. 54, 58, 61, 64-70, 99, 105.

⁷ Id. i. 150, 152, 155, 158.

in Hall's Chronicle,¹ and in Laboureur's Histoire de Charles VI.² Of the others the most valuable belong to the reign of Edward IV.³ Attention may be directed to the curious letter professing to have been addressed by Henry V to his cousin of France in 1414,⁴ in which with much jesting he thanks the French Prince for his gifts, and assures him that his mock shall turn to shame, 'for ye wot of right I am master of the game.' It is probably a pure invention; but, whether genuine or not, is clearly intended to be a jocular retort to the present of the tennis-balls.

Champollion-Figeac's *Lettres de Rois, Reines, et autres personages des Cours de France et d'Angleterre*⁵ contains nearly a hundred letters of the fifteenth century. They are nearly all diplomatic documents in French or Latin relating to Anglo-French affairs in the reigns of Henry V and Henry VI. Amongst them is the account of the Agincourt campaign from the Salisbury City Archives,⁶ and a list of the English captains in France⁷ as given by Williams in his edition of the Gesta Henrici Quinti. Eight documents for the reign of Edward IV include the agreement of Charles of Guienne to support the Lancastrian Restoration in 1470.⁸

The most important papers in Delpit's *Collection des documents français en Angleterre*⁹ come from the Archives of the City of London at the Guildhall. Many of these can now be found more conveniently elsewhere.¹⁰ The few others which are given in full are formal official documents.

We cannot leave this part of our subject without some account of the miscellaneous letters contained in the series of Ancient Correspondence at the Record Office. There are upwards of three hundred letters in all, chiefly in volumes xliii, xliv, li, and lvii, but there are also a few in volume lviii.¹¹ As might be expected, the greater number are formal official

¹ Id. i. 78, 108, 164.

² Id. i. 93, 96.

³ Id. i. 126, 136-50.

⁴ Id. i. 77; from Lansdowne MS. 762, f. 3.

⁵ Vol. ii, pp. 304-500, ap. Documents inédits à servir pour l'histoire de France, Paris, 1847.

⁶ pp. 336-9. There is an English summary in Hist. MSS. Comm., 2nd Report, 94; see p. 389 below.

⁷ pp. 339-43; cf. Gesta, pp. 275-9.

⁸ pp. 488-91.

⁹ pp. 212-70.

¹⁰ See further, p. 217 below.

¹¹ See Record Office Lists and Indexes, No. 15, pp. 200-4, 237-9, 258-63.

letters of no particular importance. But there are also some of distinct interest, such as a letter, dated February 12, 1419, in which Henry V writes from Rouen to a bishop in England that the King of Castile was preparing a fleet to attack Southampton, and gives directions for provision of defence.¹ In another letter Thomas Langley reports early in 1416 as to negotiations with the French Princes who were prisoners in England.² A third instance is a Letter of Privy Seal from Henry VI with reference to Burgundy's attack on Calais in 1436.³ Besides public documents there are a very considerable number of private letters. Some are addressed to great personages or to officials; and so may naturally have found their way to the public archives. But others deal with the affairs of humble individuals; the presence of these is probably due to the seizure of the correspondence of persons who had fallen under suspicion. Several groups of private letters can be traced; there are, for instance, half a dozen relating to the priory of Berden in Essex.⁴ Most of the private letters are of an ordinary type, and few are of any outstanding interest. One or two contain political references; in a letter from a young lawyer in London, dated March 13, 1451, there is a statement that 'the noble Bishop of Hereford and the Duchess of Suffolk are acquit by the lords', together with some other references to judicial proceedings;⁵ unfortunately this letter is so torn that it is of little use. In another letter, to one Horkesley, the writer states that Master Hawarde (perhaps John Howard, afterwards Duke of Norfolk) said 'that ye have complained on him to the lords at the Parliament at Coventry, and that ye laboured there for to have him attaint for an extorcioner'.⁶ The date of this letter must be at the end of 1459 or beginning of 1460.⁷

The collections of official correspondence previously described are all more or less artificial. The next to be

¹ Ancient Correspondence, xliii. 162.

² Id. lvii. 79.

³ Id. lviii. 47.

⁴ Id. xliii. 151; xliv. 36; li. 60, 61, 62, 94.

⁵ Id. li. 59. The Bishop of Hereford is Reginald Bowlers, see pp. 297 and 385 below.

⁶ Id. li. 35.

⁷ I do not of course deal with the great number of administrative letters and documents in Rymer's Foedera, vols. viii-xii. I have noticed two private letters on p. 212 above. The earliest official documents in English belong to 1417 (Foedera, ix. 427-30, 434-5).

treated is a connected series in so far as it consists of letters addressed to the City of London by great persons, or written to such persons on behalf of the City. The originals are preserved in the Archives at the Guildhall. Twenty-nine of them are printed by Dr. Sharpe in the third volume of London and the Kingdom.¹ Some others for the reign of Henry V will be found in Riley's Memorials of London Life,² and still more in Delpit's Collection des documents français en Angleterre.³ All these relate to public affairs. Others of a more purely civic character are contained in Dr. Sharpe's Calendar of Letter-book K.⁴ The series begins with the reign of Henry V, during which most of the letters relate to the French war. The King reports the capture of Caen, and the crossing of the Seine to besiege Rouen.⁵ The City sends provisions for the army, and gratefully acknowledges dispatches from the King reporting his further progress. The latest reports Henry's movements in July 1421.⁶ In addition to the mere statement of facts the letters contain some indication of Henry's plans and policy. The whole series is of great interest and value. Whether Henry's letters are actually of his own composition may be doubted, though the substance and comments may be accepted as representing what he desired. That Henry could write well in English is, however, shown by a note of his to a lengthy state paper: 'For the secretness of this matter I have written this instruction with my own hand and sealed it with my signet of the eagle.'⁷

The letters for the early part of the reign of Henry VI are of a similar character; the most interesting are one from the Earl of Salisbury on his way to Orleans in 1428,⁸ and another from Cardinal Beaufort at Ghent in April 1432,⁹ announcing his intended return to England 'to know the causes why

¹ iii. 359-92.

² pp. 593, 617-20, 654, 657, 658, 664, 674.

³ pp. 213-17, 219-38, 248-57, 260-3, 265; there are 39 documents in all, including some copies of Letters Patent, and 5 letters from the City of Paris; of 24 letters proper to London, 13 are given by Sharpe and 4 by Riley; for the others see pp. 217, 219-22, 224.

⁴ pp. 298, 301-4, 370, 402; many other letters are summarized in the Calendars I and K.

⁵ Delpit, pp. 220, 224-6; Memorials, 657-60.

⁶ Sharpe, p. 365. Besides the letters from the King there are others from the Duke of Clarence.

⁷ Foedera, ix. 427-30.

⁸ Sharpe, p. 370.

⁹ Id. p. 374.

I am thus strangely demeaned'. For the latest years of the reign from 1456 to 1460 there are several important documents relating to the taking of Sandwich by the French in 1457, and to the troubles in the City on the arrival of the Yorkist lords in 1460.¹ Three documents deal with the Bastard of Fauconberg's attack on London in May 1470.² A translation of the minutes of the Common Council on the occasion of the Lancastrian Restoration³ deserves attention for its record of how 'the lord Henry the Sixth, who for many years had been confined in a certain cell within the Tower, was conducted by the Mayor and Aldermen to a chamber adorned with handsome furniture, which Queen Elizabeth had fitted up, and in which she purposed being brought to bed.' The minutes were kept in Latin, but the majority of the letters are in English; Henry V writes in English on and after August 9, 1417; the first English letter from Clarence is on August 5, 1418, and the first from the City on August 12 of that year. The English letters are early and interesting specimens of the class of composition to which they belong.

The third volume of the *Litterae Cantuarienses*⁴ contains a large number of letters written between 1400 and 1480. Most of them relate only to the affairs of Christchurch Priory, but a few are of political interest. The first is a letter from Archbishop Arundel in which he describes the Rising of the Earls in January 1400, and his own narrow escape.⁵ This is the most important political document in the collection; but others are the long letter of safe-conduct granted by Charles VII for Margaret of Anjou in October 1443,⁶ the conditional pardon for Cade in 1450,⁷ and an English speech addressed to the Commons in Parliament in 1474 seeking their support for the proposed war with France.⁸ There are also some letters of commercial interest relating to the Hanse.⁹ As might be expected, the majority of the letters are in Latin; the earliest English letter (from the Prior) is dated December 11, 1432;¹⁰

¹ Sharpe, pp. 376-85.

² Id. p. 387.

³ Id. p. 385.

⁴ Edited by Dr. J. B. Sheppard in the Rolls Series, vol. iii, pp. 73-306.

⁵ Id. iii. 73-5.

⁶ Id. iii. 176-82.

⁷ Id. iii. 207-10.

⁸ Id. iii. 274-85.

⁹ Id. iii. 91-8, 100-8.

¹⁰ Id. iii. 160-1.

towards the end English letters become more frequent; there are ten between 1474 and 1480.¹ Dr. Sheppard did not reprint in the Rolls Series any of the letters which he had included in his earlier volume of Christ Church Letters.² In that volume there are about forty letters dated between 1430 and 1485; the majority are English letters addressed to the Prior on the business of his monastery. One or two contain political references; in 1483 Thomas Langton, Bishop of St. Davids, who was with Richard III at York, wrote: [The King] 'contents the people where he goes best that ever did prince . . . On my truth I liked never the conditions of any prince so well as his.'³ However, it must be remembered that Langton had just received his bishopric, and was hoping for a speedy translation to a better one. A letter from Prior Sellyng to Thomas Chaundler deserves attention.⁴

The Epistolae Academicæ,⁵ which comprise the correspondence of the University of Oxford between 1427 and 1509, are, like the Litterae Cantuarienses, concerned primarily with the affairs of the institution to which they belong. They are often of value for the history of learning in England; but it is only incidentally and occasionally that they touch politics, as when with tragic irony on May 6, 1450, they congratulate the Duchess of Suffolk on the good speeding of her matters in London,⁶ and in May 1470 assure the King that no scholar had taken arms on either side.⁷ The University congratulated Henry VI on his restoration, and Edward IV on his recovery of the crown. Richard III was complimented on his good government, and the victory of Henry VII at Bosworth was promptly welcomed.⁸ Such letters were merely formal; the University is cleared of the charge of time-serving by the courage with which it appealed to Richard III in defence of Morton.⁹ Latin, of course, held its own as the language for the official correspondence of a University. But there are ¹ Id. iii. 285-8, 298-306.

² Christ Church Letters, Camden Society, 2nd Series, 1877. There are some further Christ Church Letters in Various Collections, i. 205-81 (Royal Hist. MSS. Commission); see pp. 391, 393 below.

³ Christ Church Letters, pp. 45-6.

⁵ Edited by Rev. H. Anstey for the Oxford Historical Society.

⁶ Epistolae Academicæ, p. 303.

⁸ Id. pp. 391, 395, 495, 500.

⁴ Id. p. 23.

⁷ Id. p. 387.

⁹ Id. p. 494.

a certain number of English letters,¹ of which the earliest is addressed to the Speaker, Knights, and Burgesses of Parliament in 1439.² The use of English here, and in letters addressed to London citizens, or to the Duchess of Suffolk, explains itself. The Latinity of the letters is mediaeval; those in English are in no way remarkable.

Let us now turn to collections of a more limited range, taking them as far as possible in their chronological order. Hingeston's Royal and Historical Letters for the Reign of Henry IV in the Rolls Series stops short at 1404. It includes a certain number of domestic papers, and amongst them the earlier of the Welsh letters given by Ellis. But it is devoted chiefly to diplomatic correspondence, and especially to papers relating to the commercial relations of England with Flanders and the Hanse. These last come from the valuable Cotton. MS. Galba B i, the whole of which was edited by M. Gilliodts van Severen in 1896;³ the bulk of the documents are earlier than 1415, about twenty belong to the reign of Henry VI, and a few to that of Edward IV.

Caro's Aus der Kanzlei Sigmunds contains documents from the Imperial Chancery which are of great importance for the negotiations of Sigismund with Henry V.

For the history of the French war during the reign of Henry VI we have the Letters and Papers Illustrative of the English Wars in France, edited by the Rev. J. Stevenson in the Rolls Series. It is primarily a collection of official documents, writs, commissions, and reports relating to the English administration of the conquered territory. Some of the documents, however, touch English history more directly, such as the papers relating to the schemes of Humphrey of Gloucester,⁴ and the valuable series on the negotiations with ¹ About twenty of earlier date than 1485; the later ones are rather more numerous, but are nearly all addressed to the University by Henry VII and members of his family.

² Epistolae Academicæ, p. 184.

³ Le Cotton. MS. Galba B i, ap. Collection de Chroniques Belges inédites. Some documents are wrongly dated: No. cxlviii, by Henry Beaufort, from Bruges on September 4, must belong to 1417, not 1415; No. cliii should be assigned to October 21, 1418, not to 1416; No. clvii is assigned by the editor to March-April, 1418, but is itself dated and endorsed '17 March xxvii Henrici vj', i.e. 1449, which the contents and its signature by Thomas Kent show to be correct.

⁴ Vol. ii. pp. 386-93, 401-4, 417-18.

Charles of Orleans in 1432,¹ and on his release in 1440;² the latter include the protest of Humphrey of Gloucester, and his charges against Cardinal Beaufort.³ Another important series deals with the negotiations for peace in 1444-5, and the surrender of Maine in 1447.⁴ The majority of the documents are derived from French archives and libraries. The chief source for the remainder is Arundel MS. 48, at the College of Arms, which contains the Collections of William Worcester.

Of greater literary interest is the Official Correspondence of Thomas Bekynton,⁵ which is a collection of documents made by the bishop in the course of his official career. Henry Wharton⁶ described it as comprising 'very many letters of the bishop himself, written in his own or the King's name, and of others sent to him or to the King during the time that he was his secretary, besides other distinguished monuments of his age, which had fallen into his hands, brought together without any order or arrangement.'

Bekynton began his official life in the service of Humphrey of Gloucester; as a scholar he there found congenial colleagues, and his tastes and friendships make his Correspondence occasionally of interest for the early history of the Renaissance in England.⁷ Afterwards he was secretary to Henry VI from 1437 to 1443, and so was in frequent communication with foreign statesmen and diplomatic agents. In 1442 he was sent on an abortive mission to negotiate the suggested marriage between Henry VI and a daughter of the Count of Armagnac. The Journal⁸ of his embassy, and his letters during its progress, are the chief sources of information for that affair. In 1443 he was made Bishop of Bath and Wells. Between that date and his death in 1465 there are comparatively few letters, and those are nearly all of a personal kind.

Many of the earliest letters relate to the University of Oxford, in which Bekynton (he was a Fellow of New College) always preserved a lively interest. Others throw light on the career of Humphrey of Gloucester; such as the agreement

¹ Id. ii. 219-62.

² Id. ii. 440-62.

³ Id. ii. 440-51.

⁴ Id. ii. 67-159 [638, 696-704].

⁵ Edited by Rev. G. Williams in the Rolls Series, from Lambeth MS. 211.

⁶ Anglia Sacra, i. 178.

⁷ See Correspondence, i. 264-75, 311-154.

⁸ Id. ii. 177-248.

between Humphrey and John of Bedford,¹ attributed by Stubbs to 1426. Bekynton's service with Gloucester no doubt brought into his hands an instructive letter in which the Bishop of Bayeux describes to the Duke the miserable state of Normandy.² The Council of Basle fills a large place in the Correspondence, and after Bekynton became the King's secretary, the majority of the letters are addressed to or from persons at the Papal Court; as such they are valuable for ecclesiastical history. Others are written to foreign princes, and though generally of a complimentary character, are useful for the foreign relations of England. Special attention may be directed to two of them for their bearing on the Bohemian career of Peter Payne, the Lollard.³ All these letters, together with those relating to King's College and Eton, have an interest as indicating how Henry VI was attracted most by ecclesiastical and educational affairs. The great majority of the letters are, as their nature requires, written in Latin. But it is noticeable that where Bekynton writes to the King he does so commonly in English, as he also does in the unstudied letters which he addressed to friends on his way to Plymouth in 1442.⁴ Bekynton's Latin letters are careful and scholarly pieces of composition. Of his personal correspondence the most interesting are the letters which passed between him and Thomas Chaundler, the Warden of New College at Oxford.

The so-called *Letters of Margaret of Anjou*⁵ belong for the most part to the class of semi-official correspondence. They do not all concern the Queen, and there are really three separate collections, which are united through the accident that they were all copied into the same book late in the fifteenth century. The first series consists of forty-two letters, chiefly official, written between 1415 and 1444.⁶ Many of them are concerned with the safe-keeping of Calais, and others

¹ Correspondence, i. 138-43.

² Id. i. 289.

³ Id. i. 187-9; they have reference to Payne's capture by John Burian of Gutenstein in 1440; for another letter on the same subject see Epistolae Academicæ, p. 195.

⁴ See p. 223 below.

⁵ Edited by C. Monro for the Camden Society in 1863.

⁶ 'J. B.', the supposed writer of No. xi, is clearly to be identified with John Russell, the associate of John Claydon, the Lollard; so its date is 1416. See Riley, Memorials of London Life, pp. 630-3. Some of the other initials (as E. L. B. in Nos. xxv-xxvii) may be similarly inaccurate.

are of a formal character. The majority are written in English. Of the Latin letters only two are of importance: the first¹ a letter of congratulation to Henry V after Agincourt from one of his chaplains; the other a report to the King from one of his agents at Constance in 1415.²

The second series consists of seventeen English letters of Thomas Bekynton which are not to be found in his Official Correspondence. The first eleven were written by Bekynton on his way to Plymouth, when going to Guienne in 1442. They are interesting for comparison with his Journal, but are not in themselves of much importance. The last six are mere headings of letters from Bordeaux.

Of Margaret's own letters (nearly all in English) there are seventy-six. Most of them relate to the affairs of her household and the management of her estates. Many are written to obtain preferment or favours for friends or dependants.³ Some are of interest as illustrating her pleasures and dress.⁴ None are of any political importance. All or nearly all belong to the first ten years of Margaret's life in England. In a negative way they may perhaps indicate how little she concerned herself during that time in affairs of State. Sir James Ramsay⁵ thinks they 'do not give a favourable impression of her dealings with her husband's subjects', and involve 'greater or less interference with private rights'; he finds those 'most objectionable in which she seeks to interfere with pending litigation'.⁶ But it must be remembered in answer to this that Margaret was doing no more than any other person of rank at the time did commonly;⁷ there is nothing in the letters to show that her favours were bestowed undeservedly or her influence used unduly; they might be cited with equal force in proof of her solicitude to secure her humble dependants from the oppression of others. At all events Margaret cannot be condemned on their evidence.

Some other letters for the reign of Henry VI are printed from the Register of Abbot Curteys in Memorials of

¹ Letters of Margaret of Anjou, No. i.

² Id. No. ii.

³ e.g. Nos. lx, lxii, lxiii.

⁴ e.g. Nos. lxi, lxxiii, lxxxiii.

⁵ Lancaster and York, ii. 141.

⁶ e.g. Nos. cxix, cxx, cxxiii.

⁷ For an outrageous instance see the case of Thomas Banns on pp. 391-2 below.

St. Edmund's Abbey; ¹ there are twenty-one in all, belonging to the years from 1440 to 1444. The most interesting are English letters from the King with reference to his marriage and the prosecution of the war with France.

In Cotton. MS. Cleopatra C iv, ff. 124-204, there are copies of letters addressed to William Swan, who was employed in the Papal service at Rome, by high officials in England. They relate chiefly to ecclesiastical affairs, but include some political references. Amongst the writers are John Kemp, Thomas Langley, and John Stafford. Most of the letters are in Latin.

For the reign of Edward IV there is no important collection of official correspondence apart from Public Records. In the absence of any such collection it is convenient to note here that a fair number could be brought together from the collections of Ellis, Halliwell-Phillipps, Champollion-Figeac, the Guildhall Archives, and the Rutland papers.²

Dr. Gairdner's Letters and Papers of the Reigns of Richard III and Henry VII, in the Rolls Series, includes in the first volume a number of official documents for the reign of Richard III. Another valuable source is Harley MS. 433 at the British Museum, which is primarily a register of grants passing under the privy seal, but includes a number of letters and documents of a less formal character. The total number of documents contained in the Register is very large.³ Dr. Gairdner made ample use of it in his Life of Richard III, and printed a number of letters in full.⁴ Nearly all the letters for the reign of Richard III in Ellis's collection⁵ come from this manuscript. The Register begins with the assumption of the Protectorate by Richard of Gloucester. The earliest documents therefore belong to the brief reign of Edward V; these were printed in J. G. Nichols's Grants of Edward V.⁶

The chief value of the important series of letters which are

¹ Ed. T. Arnold in the Rolls Series. See vol. iii. 241-79. Two of the letters were printed by Ellis.

² See pp. 213, 215 and 218 above, and p. 392 below.

³ The imperfect Calendar in the Catalogue of the Harleian MSS. i, 256-311, has nearly 3,000 entries. Another Calendar (also imperfect) is in Additional MS. 11269.

⁴ Gairdner, Richard III, pp. 210, 238, 247, 248, 397, 398.

⁵ See p. 213 above.

⁶ Edited for Camden Society in 1854.

printed in Robert Davies's Extracts from the Municipal Records of the City of York is for the reign of Richard III. Some earlier letters, which belong to 1475 and 1478, are of less general interest. But those for 1483-5 are of considerable political importance,¹ as are also some other documents of a more formal character. These latter include extracts from the accounts of city expenditure, which give a few details of historical interest, and also the municipal minutes between 1480 and 1485, which supply some useful information for events in the north, and illustrate the local popularity of Richard of Gloucester. The record closes with a note on August 23, 1485, of the 'great hevynesse' with which the City heard of Richard's death.²

In conclusion I will specify some of the more important isolated letters which are to be found in various places. Scattered through the Reports of the Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts there are a not inconsiderable number of fifteenth-century letters, private, semi-official, or formal. Since they are not always easy to trace it has seemed useful to construct a Calendar, which will sufficiently illustrate their character and value.³ The only series of importance is found in the letters which the Duke of Clarence, the Earl of Warwick, and Edward IV addressed to Henry Vernon of Haddon between March 15 and May 10, 1471; they are of great interest for the events of that time. The official letters include some letters of Privy Seal touching political affairs. Of the private letters the one which John Albon wrote with a description of a visit which Henry V paid to Agincourt calls for notice, both as one of the few letters from soldiers serving in France, and as relating to an otherwise unknown incident.⁴

Fonblanque's Annals of the House of Percy contains a few letters of the early part of the reign of Henry IV,⁵ and one from the then Earl of Northumberland in 1457.⁶ In Pinkerton's *History of Scotland*⁷ there are three letters

¹ Some of them are reprinted in Halliwell-Phillipps's Letters, &c., and in Gairdner's Richard III.

² York Records, p. 218.

³ See pp. 389-94 below.

⁴ The letter is dated simply July 27. The editor suggests for the year 1417, which is impossible. The most likely date is 1419; see p. 389 below.

⁵ See p. 213 above.

⁶ Annals, &c., i.

⁷ i. 448-52, 501.

on affairs of the Scottish Marches during the reign of Henry IV.¹ Duckett's *Charters and Records of Cluni*¹ contains two letters by Thomas Elmham, which are of some interest for the writer's career and for the preparations for war in 1415. In Sir John Fortescue's *Works*² there are printed half a dozen letters; one, in English, is written by Lord Hungerford and Robert Whittingham to Queen Margaret from Dieppe on August 30, 1461; the others relate to a Lancastrian project to obtain help from Portugal in December 1464; they were all no doubt drafted by Sir John Fortescue, who writes in one of them, 'we bethe alle in grete poverte, but yet the quene susteyneth us in mete and drinke;' another is signed by Edward, Prince of Wales, 'with myn own hand that ye may se how gode wrytare I am.' Two letters from the Earl of Warwick to Elizabeth Woodville recommending Sir Hugh John as a prospective husband are printed in Archaeologia.³ Bentley's Excerpta Historica, besides a few Stonor letters and a variety of state papers, contains a private letter of one Lowes Lyneham, written in June 1465.⁴ Two or three private letters of similar date in Napier's *History of Ewelme*⁵ are of little interest. Two private letters from Antony Woodville, Earl Rivers, which are printed by Dr. Gairdner in his Life of Richard III,⁶ are interesting for the writer's personality.

I do not of course pretend to have made here a complete list of all private letters of the fifteenth century⁷ which exist in print, much less of those which remain in manuscript. Considering the ravages of time and accident the number of such letters seems to be rather remarkable than otherwise. If they are not of such common occurrence as to make any letters of this age undeserving of attention, they are certainly numerous enough and varied enough to prove that the practice of letter-writing, apart from the necessities of business, was very far from being an unusual accomplishment. They afford

¹ ii. 15-22. See p. 45 above.

² Ed. Lord Clermont, vol. ii, pp. 17, 22-31.

³ xxix. 132-3.

⁴ Excerpta Historica, p. 11.

⁵ pp. 99, 107.

⁶ 2nd edition, pp. 395-6; see, for another letter, p. 271.

⁷ For other instances of isolated letters see pp. 212, 216, 222-3 above, and 389-94 below.

sure evidence that a reasonable degree of education was much more widespread than has sometimes been suggested. Incidentally they often show that an interest in literature was not wanting. If in their form they are generally rude and unstudied, the circumstances under which they were written has made them of the greatest value not only for social history, but also for the history of literature and politics.

CHAPTER IX

POETRY AND BALLADS

THE student of historical sources can never afford to disregard contemporary poetry altogether. Least of all can he do so in such an age as the fifteenth century, when ballads are the most natural form for popular historical narrative, and verse is the commonest vehicle not only for political satire, but for political controversy as well. Though the fifteenth century was singularly barren of good poetry other than lyrics, the volume of contemporary verse was considerable, and it would be possible to construct from it a tolerably consecutive commentary on the History of the Age. But in the present place, where there is no occasion for free quotation, it will be more useful to classify the material, and to characterize separately the historical significance and importance of each group.

Latin contemporary verse bearing on political events was common enough throughout the Middle Ages. In our period there is a certain amount of such poetical material, and more especially during its opening years. It is, however, much inferior both in quantity and quality to the English verse, which though thin and scattered at the start becomes copious towards the close. As regards the English verse, it will be convenient to treat separately: first, the literary, if often indifferent, productions of writers like Hoccleve and Lydgate, the historical interest of which is as a rule incidental; secondly, certain pieces which, though not strictly narrative, have a direct bearing on history; and finally, to take those ballads and short poems in which are embodied the most popular history and current opinion of the time.

The Latin poetry of the fifteenth century need detain us but for a moment. Though John Gower lived into the reign of Henry IV, his literary activity belonged to the previous reign. He had ultimately attached himself to the opposition to the Court party, and was able to celebrate the triumph of his political friends in the Revolution of 1399.¹ His Cronica Tripartita is valuable for the downfall of Richard II, but scarcely belongs to our period. The short Latin pieces which he addressed to Henry IV are congratulatory or hortatory, and together with a longer English poem of a similar character, have no historical interest except as expressing the hopefulness with which the new dynasty was welcomed by its friends.² If Gower lived long enough to be somewhat disillusioned (he died in 1408) he did not put his change of sentiments into writing.

The principal writer of Latin historical poetry in the early part of the fifteenth century was Thomas Elmham; but with his Liber Metricus, and minor pieces, it has been more convenient to deal in another place.³ The most interesting of the other Latin verse of this time are the Versus Rythmici, written in praise of Henry V, by a Monk of Westminster; they give a useful description of the King's personal appearance and character, but are otherwise of no importance.⁴ Of the short Latin pieces given in Wright's Political Poems, some religious verses on Archbishop Scrope,⁵ and a few lines on the death of Henry V,⁶ call for no more than a bare mention. The only later Latin poetry of any note are the bad verses incorporated in Abbot Whethamstede's Register, of which they form the least valuable part.⁷ Some Latin hymns for Henry VI are printed in the Trevelyan Papers.⁸ None of this Latin poetry, with the partial exception of Elmham's Liber Metricus, is of any great historical value. Nor is it to be taken as reflecting in any marked degree the popular opinion of the time. It is all the work of men with whom the old literary tradition was strong, and is inspired by the sentiment of the Cloister.

If industry and copious production could be taken as a criterion Hoccleve and Lydgate would fill a large place in our literature. Both of them began to write under Henry IV

¹ Works of John Gower, iv. 314-43, ed. G. C. Macaulay.

² Id. iv. 154, 343-6; Wright, Political Poems, ii. 1-15.

³ See pp. 49, 50 above.

⁴ Cole, Memorials of Henry V, pp. 63-75.

⁵ ii. 114-18.

⁶ ii. 129.

⁷ See p. 154 above.

⁸ Vol. i, pp. 53-60.

and lived far into the reign of his grandson. So far, therefore, as period of time goes, their careers might have furnished us with material of the highest value. But both of them found their chief literary interest in moral and didactic verse, or in the case of Lydgate in long metrical romances. Thus, though both of them, and Lydgate in particular, wrote some historical pieces, much that is most useful in their work appears incidentally.

Thomas Hoccleve, who was born about 1370 and was alive in 1449, was a clerk in the Privy Seal Office, and wrote his first important poem, the Male Regle,¹ in 1406; like other of his works, it contains a good deal that is autobiographical, and is of interest for the social life of the time. His longest work is the Regement of Princes,² which he dedicated to Henry of Monmouth in 1412. The main part of the poem is based on the Secreta Secretorum, the De Regimine Principum of Aegidius Colonna, and the 'Chess moralized' of Jacques de Cessoles. Scattered through it are numerous slight allusions to current events; but for our present purpose it is of less interest than the lengthy poem, and the advice to the Prince with which it concludes. The poem is put in the form of a dialogue with an old beggar, and is full of interest for social life, especially in London; it contains also an account of the execution of the Lollard, John Badby, in 1410, and of the Prince's intervention.³ At the end of the poem Hoccleve advises his patron on foreign policy. France and England, he says, ought to be one at heart; he was 'stuffed with woe' to see the mischief caused by foreign war and civil discord; purchase peace by way of marriage, and let him, that right heir is, cease all strife; then might the two realms make war upon the unbelievers, and bring them into the faith of Christ.⁴ Hoccleve is not here propounding anything original. He himself admits that he had borrowed it from the Revelations of St. Bridget. Moreover, the whole idea was in the air. Hardyng expresses it in a very similar form in the first version of his Chronicle.⁵ If it did not actually inspire the foreign policy of Henry V,

¹ Works, i. 25-39, E.E.T.S.

² Id. iii. 1-197.

³ Id. iii. 11, 12.

⁴ Id. iii. 191-6.

⁵ Engl. Hist. Rev. xxvii. 744.

he used it for his justification when he appealed to the princes of Germany for their support in his French war on account of 'the good and profit that might arise, if there were peace and rest amongst Christian princes, for then might they together intend against Miscreants'.¹

On Henry's accession to the throne, Hoccleve set up for a Court poet. He versified on the King's address to the lords when they tendered their homage on March 21, 1413,² gave counsel to the King and the Knights of the Garter,³ and commended Henry for his action in the honourable reinterment of Richard II.⁴ It is a common theme in all three pieces that the new King should govern his people in law and equity, and be the champion of the Church against heresy; in this he was no doubt the spokesman of orthodox officialdom. Of somewhat greater interest is the lengthy poem on Oldcastle,⁵ which is, however, chiefly argumentative and contains little history; the Lollard leader is exhorted to remember the examples of chivalry and his own manly knighthood, it was a shame that he should be hiding when the Prince was labouring in arms beyond the sea. The poem is noteworthy for the time of its composition, when Henry was at Southampton preparing for his voyage to Harfleur in August. It would seem to suggest that the occasion for this appeal to Oldcastle was his supposed complicity in the Scrope and Cambridge plot. Of Hoccleve's later ballads one addressed to Richard, Duke of York,⁶ is of interest as showing that he was still alive in 1448.

John Lydgate (1370?–1451?), like Hoccleve, was a Court poet. He wrote his Troy Book at the request of Henry V; and his Falls of Princes for Humphrey of Gloucester. Some of his minor pieces of an historical character were also written for political patrons, as the poem On the English title to the Crown of France,⁷ which he composed at the suggestion of the Earl of Warwick in 1426. None of these minor poems are of any great historical value; two, which were written in support of peace with France in 1444,⁸ have a certain

¹ Foedera, x, 162.

² Works, i, 39, 40.

³ Id. i, 41–3.

⁴ Id. i, 47–9.

⁵ Id. i, 8–24.

⁶ Id. i, 49–51.

⁷ Wright, Political Poems, ii, 131–40.

⁸ Id. ii, 204–20.

interest if we may suppose them to have been composed to order in defence of the policy of the government. Lydgate's other poems of a more or less historical character are two on the occasion of Henry VI's coronation¹ (with which go the verses for the Soteltes at the coronation banquet²), and the verses on the reception of Henry VI at London in February 1432³; these latter are of interest as one of the best descriptions of a mediaeval city pageant. London Lickpenny, a humorous satire on London life, is useful for its illustration of social history; but Dr. MacCracken rejects its ascription to Lydgate.⁴ The *Battaile of Agincourt*⁵ has been commonly attributed to Lydgate, but probably without sufficient reason.

There were few poetical writers in the latter part of the fifteenth century whose names have survived. George Ashby (d. 1475) is the only one with whose writings we are concerned. He was clerk of the signet to Henry VI before 1438, and afterwards held the same position with Margaret of Anjou.⁶ In his old age, probably towards 1470, he wrote a poem *On the Policy of a Prince*⁷ for the instruction of Edward, Prince of Wales, son of Henry VI. It consists of advice as to the bearing of a prince towards his subjects; incidentally it contains allusions to past events. Of Henry VI he says that if he had devoided covetous folk

From his person, his people had not sterve
With such great batellis dispiteous.

Prince Edward is counselled to take warning from the recent experience of falsehood, misrule, and extortion. He should practise moderation, live within his income, see that his laws were kept, and suppress maintenance. All this is an instructive judgement on the evils that prevailed in the latter part of the reign of Henry VI.

¹ Wright, Political Poems, ii. 141-8.

² Cf. Nicolas, Lond. Chron. 168-9, and MacCracken, Minor Poems, p. xxviii.

³ Chronicles of London, 97-116.

⁴ Nicolas, pp. 260-8; cf. MacCracken, u.s. p. xlvii.

⁵ See pp. 238-40 below.

⁶ Cal. Pat. Rolls, Henry VI, iii. 150, 177; iv. 433; v. 515. Cf. Letters of Margaret of Anjou, p. 114.

⁷ George Ashby's Poems, pp. 12-41; E.E.T.S. 1899; the only manuscript is Cambridge Univ. Libr. Mm. iv. 42.

Of those English poems which, though not narrative, have a direct bearing on history, the first in point of time is a collection of pieces written by an anonymous author during the first quarter of the century. This collection was edited from Digby MS. 102 for the Early English Text Society by Dr. J. Kail in 1904 as Twenty-six Political and other Poems. The political poems are written with a general reference to events of the time, but contain little that is precise.¹ The uniform attitude of the author is shown in one of the earliest pieces, Truth, Rest and Peace, written perhaps in 1401:²

A kyngdom in commons lys,
Alle profytes and alle mischeues,
Lordis wet neuer what commons greues
Till heer rentis bigynne to ses.

So also in a later poem, God Save the King and keep the Crown,³ Henry V is exhorted to govern well:

For commons is the fairest flour
That euer God sette on erthely crown.

A rather different note is struck in Dede is Worchyng,⁴ where the King is counselled after making peace at home, to Strengthe your marche and kepe the see :

he is further assured that he may justly pursue his title in France. The poem with the most precise application is one styled A remembrance of fifty-two follies,⁵ which is directed against John of Burgundy and his Flemish subjects. The collection is manifestly the work of a man of popular and patriotic sympathies. Probably he found in Henry V his ideal ruler.

Productions like the attack of Jack Upland on the friars, and the *Reply of Friar Daw Topias*⁶ relate to religious controversy and do not fall within our subject. Still, it is interesting to note that their date seems to be fixed by a statement that the King 'now late hanged you traitors',⁷ which appears to refer to the conspiracy of the Prior of Launde and other Franciscans in 1402.

¹ The editor seems to read rather too much into them.

² p. 12, No. III.

³ pp. 50-5, No. XII.

⁴ pp. 55-60, No. XIII.

⁵ pp. 69-72, No. XVI.

⁶ Wright, Political Poems, ii. 16-114.

⁷ Id. ii. 87.

Another politico-religious poem, Against the Lollards,¹ is of more direct historical interest. The occasion was clearly Oldcastle's rebellion of 1414, and the writer gives the orthodox official opinion when he marks the motive as not purely religious, but

Under colour of such lollyng
To shape sodeyn surreccioun.

Apart from its interest in this connexion the poem is distinguished for its vigour and literary merit.

Of far greater value are pieces in which a poetical dress is given to a serious political argument. The chief of these, The Libel of English Policy,² is in some respects the most important article dealt with in this chapter. From its internal evidence it was clearly written immediately after the successful defence of Calais in 1436, in the attack on which the Flemish towns had taken a foremost part. This had strengthened the old commercial hostility of England for Flanders; it also brought home to the writer the importance of Calais, and the need for the better keeping of the narrow seas. The first part of the pamphlet is devoted to explaining how easily, by the aid of a strong navy, the trade which had to pass through the Channel might be controlled, to the great advantage of England, and to the detriment of the Flemish towns. Incidentally the author gives a valuable and interesting account of the products and trade both of England and of foreign countries. He shows a just appreciation of the strength and importance of the commercial position of England in relation to the rest of Europe. His good judgement is shown also when he dwells on the need 'to keep Ireland, that it be not lost', and argues that if the money, which was being lavished to no avail on the French war, were applied to this purpose, it would suffice in a single year to set all in rest.³ The Libel concludes with a strong argument for the provision of a more efficient navy, contrasting the weakness of the then government with the vigour shown under Henry V, than whom

Of sea-keeping, intending victory
No better was prince of strenuity.⁴

¹ Wright, Political Poems, ii. 243-7.

³ Id. ii. 185-90.

² Id. ii. 157-205.

⁴ Id. ii. 200.

As a matter of commercial policy the author urges that foreigners should be given no greater privileges in England than Englishmen had abroad. Foreign merchants should be compelled 'to go to host' with an English merchant, through whom they should transact all their business.¹ A remedy should also be found for the usurious profits made by foreigners through their control of international finance. Complaint is made particularly of the Venetians, who brought articles of luxury to be exchanged for the best of English goods, cloth, wool, and tin; also by taking away gold, they sucked the thrift out of the land, as the wasp sucked honey from the bee.² Thus we have given us the germs of that policy which was afterwards developed into the Mercantile System.³

It is not insignificant that the Libel of English Policy so shortly preceded the commercial legislation of 1439-40, under which foreign merchants were required 'to go to host' during their stay in England, and to invest the produce of their sales in native merchandise.⁴ A London writer complains that this was not performed, 'to the great hindring of the merchants of England.'⁵ The commercial grievance is perhaps not unconnected with the growth of Yorkist feeling in London, and with the attention which Edward IV paid to mercantile interests. A Londoner, who made a valuable collection of poems and political documents directed against Suffolk and other unpopular ministers of the time, in 1452, includes an article on 'Commercial Grievances',⁶ complaining how foreign merchants took gold and silver out of the country, and did not purchase English merchandise. It is again noteworthy that this was just before the re-enactment in 1453 of the legislation of 1439-40. George Ashby advises Edward of Wales: ⁷

If ye will bring up again cloth-making
And keep your commons out of idleness
Ye shall therefore have many a blessing.

¹ Id. ii. 178-9.

² See Cunningham, English Industry and Commerce, i. 427, 469.

³ Rolls of Parliament, v. 24, 25, 31.

⁴ Chronicles of London, p. 153.

⁵ See pp. 362-3 below.

⁶ George Ashby's Poems, p. 29.

Under Edward IV we get a poem On England's Commercial Policy,¹ which seems to be only a meagre reproduction of the Libel.

Therefore let not our wool be sold for nought,
Neither our cloth, for they must be sought;
And in especial restrain straitly the wool,
That the commons of this land may work at the full.

The emphasis which is thus laid on the importance of considering the workers as well as the merchants distinguishes this later poem from the Libel.

A kind of composition which had much favour in the fifteenth century was the pretended 'Prophecy', modelled on the prophecies attributed to John of Bridlington (d. 1379). An older 'Prophecy of Merlin', which was current in French or Latin during the fourteenth century, foretold the fate of the six kings who succeeded John; the last was the 'accursed Mole'.² This was certainly made use of by the supporters of Glendower to attack Henry IV. In a poetical English version of that time the Mole is to be overthrown by the Dragon (Glendower), the Wolf, and the Lion.³ A later prophecy in prose made Henry IV the Fox through whom Luna (the House of Percy) lost its two horns (Hotspur and his father), but recovered in conjunction with Sol (Edward IV).⁴ Such prophecies often did service again and again, as circumstances seemed to fit. In some cases they were written after the event, but were none the less wilfully obscure, though the historical allusions very occasionally give some indication of popular opinion. The employment of such a means of political propaganda explains no doubt the appearance of four pieces of this description in the Yorkist Collection of 1452. The first, which begins: 'When the Cocke in the North hath bilde his nest,' is in various forms very common; the second is obscure; the third seems more apposite than

¹ Wright, Political Poems, ii. 282-7.

² Cotton. MS. Julius A v, ff. 177-9; Harley MS. 746.

³ Cotton. MS. Galba E ix, ff. 49, 50. See Wylie, Henry IV, ii. 375-7, and Ward, Catalogue of Romances, i. 300, 309-11, 320-4.

⁴ Id. i. 319, from Cotton. Faustina B ix. Another Percy collection of Latin prophecies, apparently made for the fourth Earl of Northumberland (d. 1489), is contained in Cotton. Vespasian E viii.

usual; whilst the fourth was clearly written with direct reference to the events of 1449-51.¹ Another brief piece of this character is printed in Wright's Political Poems.² A prophecy, probably written in the early years of Henry VII, is contained in Rawlinson C 813, Art. 53, at the Bodleian Library. It is styled 'Prophecia Johannis Merlyon', and begins:

How a lyon shalbe banished and to Berwyke gone
By the rose and the ragged staff, by frith and by felllys.

This seems to refer to the campaign of Edward IV and the Earl of Warwick in the north in 1462-3. The rest of the prophecy ranges over the next thirty years, but, though curious, is of no value. Another quotation, relating apparently to 1470-1, will illustrate the character of such pieces:

Then shall a king flee for feare, and he wist whidder,
For a dragon that shall distroy a cyte;
A boore³ shall come wth them and a yonge bull,⁴
And bringe a floxe out off hys denne that ligges in a bowere;
A female griffen and a anterlappe⁵ shall be put downe
Throughe the socoure off a lyon and the lillie floure.

Much of the remainder is even more cryptic, and it would be hopeless to attempt a complete explanation.

Of writers who have left us history in verse, John Page, the author of The Siege of Rouen, and Hardyng, the Chronicler, were rather historians than poets. They have been more appropriately dealt with elsewhere,⁶ since their works stand apart from the shorter pieces which we are now about to discuss.

The fifteenth century was peculiarly favourable to ballad literature. True ballads are in the first instance circulated orally; thus some perish, and others are varied in the process of transmission, and gradually put on a more modern dress which conceals, if it does not destroy, the historic value of the original. But some have the good fortune to be committed to writing at a date early enough to prevent the loss

¹ See the description of Cotton. Roll, ii. 23 on p. 358 below.

² ii. 249.

³ Oxford, the blue boar.

⁴ Clarence.

⁵ Margaret of Anjou and her son; the antelope was a Lancastrian badge.

⁶ See pp. 116-18 and 140-9 above.

of their most valuable characteristics. For the fifteenth century we have examples both of original and transmitted ballads. Those of the former class, though they can be only a small survival of the fittest, are numerous enough to be of great value to the historian; if it is only seldom that they preserve facts which would be otherwise unknown, they are nearly always of interest as an expression of popular opinion. Since, however, ballads are only produced on some sufficient occasion we cannot look for any continuous history; it is natural that the ballads of the fifteenth century should centre round certain marked events, and fall into well-defined groups.

At the beginning of the century the warfare on the Scottish March and in Wales must have furnished the ballad-makers with many admirable themes. But there is no ballad on Homildon, or on the exploits of the Umfravilles, to compare with the late fifteenth-century ballads on Otterburn and the mythical Chevy Chace. Of the Welsh war we know from Adam Usk¹ that 'the wonderful deeds of Edmund Mortimer were told at the feast in song'; but no example of any such ballad has survived.

Thus Agincourt and the French campaign of 1415 furnish us with our first group of ballads. The chief is the long Battaile of Agincourt attributed incorrectly to Lydgate, which is preserved in two versions. Of these one, which is the ruder, shorter, and apparently the older, was printed by Hearne in the Appendix to his edition of the Pseudo-Elmham's *Vita Henrici Quinti*² from Cotton. MS. Vitellius D xii; this manuscript was entirely destroyed in the fire of 1731. The other version was printed in Nicolas and Tyrrell's *Chronicle of London*³ from Harley MS. 565, the date of which can be fixed precisely to 1443-4.⁴ The longer version contains three 'Passus': the Siege of Harfleur; the Battle of Agincourt, and the Triumph at London. The shorter version lacks the third 'Passus', and the first six stanzas of the first 'Passus'; but has about seventy additional lines in the second 'Passus';⁵

¹ Chronicle, p. 77.

² Elmham, Vita et Gesta Henrici Quinti, pp. 359-75.

³ pp. 216-33.

⁴ See p. 85 above.

⁵ viz. eight lines after each of stanzas 5, 8, and 17; and 48 lines after stanza 19.

the greater part of this additional matter consists of a list of the prisoners. There are also numerous textual variations. The theme for the first 'Passus' is of the Dauphin's scornful present of tennis-balls, and how Henry with his great guns played tennis at Harfleur. The idea appears in other places, notably in the Brut,¹ but it is nowhere developed so fully as in this poem. The second 'Passus' describes the march to Agincourt and the battle on much the same lines as the Brut with additional detail of a more or less poetic character; but the debate of the French princes before the battle is peculiar, and is given most fully in the older version; the list of prisoners in that version comes no doubt from the same source as those in one version of the *Brut*² and in the Cleopatra Chronicle of London.³ The third 'Passus' probably follows the official programme of the Triumph, though a stanza describing how the French lords wondered at the swarm of citizens, 'England is like an hive within', seems to be an addition by the poet. The Battaile of Agincourt and the Brut are no doubt closely related, though it would be rash to argue too certainly as to their relative originality. This much, however, is clear, namely, that the prose narrative of the Brut is in part at least derived from ballad sources. Such phrases as 'the King . . . cast down both tower and town, and laid them unto the ground: and there he played at Tennis with his hard gunstones', and 'when they should play, they [the citizens] sang welaway and alas that ever any such tennis-balls were made',⁴ have an unmistakable ring of verse. But these phrases are not paralleled exactly in the Battaile of Agincourt, and the Brut would appear to preserve traces of some other ballad now lost. The narrative in the Brut was probably written before 1430, and in its original form perhaps a dozen years earlier.⁵ It does not seem possible to fix the date of the Battaile more precisely. Dr. Oskar Emmerig⁶ has argued that in the Battaile we have the original of the tennis-ball story; but the evidence of Elmham, Otterbourne, and Strecche is conclusive for its currency in other quarters.¹ The Battaile itself is, as it stands, probably a comparatively late production made up of earlier half-popular ballads.²

¹ pp. 374-6.² p. 555.³ Chronicles of London, p. 122.⁴ Brut, p. 376; see, for another instance, p. 299 below.⁵ See pp. 118-19, 132 above. ⁶ The Bataile of Agincourt; Nürnberg, 1906.

The Battaile was certainly not the only ballad of the time relating to Agincourt. Later sixteenth-century ballads³ may preserve somewhat of the contemporary poems, and possibly of the originals of the Brut. But the most strictly contemporary in its present form of all the Agincourt poems is the ballad which is in part paraphrased and in part preserved in the Cleopatra Chronicle of London.⁴ This is a finer production in a literary sense than the Battaile, and also gives the impression of being more genuinely popular. If it does not add anything material to our knowledge, it is certainly the best and most spirited of the Agincourt poems.

The Pseudo-Elmham,⁵ amplifying a curt and rather obscure sentence of Tito Livio,⁶ states that Henry V, when he made his triumphal entry into London, would not suffer any songs to be made in his praise. There is, however, extant a poem⁷ which professes to have been written and sung on this occasion; if its internal evidence is accepted it must at all events have been written in Henry's lifetime. It is interesting for its character and quality, if not remarkable for its contents.

It is difficult to suppose that no later incident of the French war in the reign of Henry V, or in the early years of Henry VI, attracted the ballad-makers. Nevertheless, we do not meet with any contemporary ballad till we come to the siege of Calais in 1436. The defection of Philip of Burgundy in 1435 had stirred English national feeling to its depths, and revived the old commercial hatred for the Flemings. The defence of Calais in the following year was assuredly a fine achievement. After Philip and his Flemish army had departed from Calais, with great shame, disworship, and loss, many rhymes of the Flemings were made amongst Englishmen.⁸ Of these ballads four specimens have been preserved, two in versions of the Brut and two elsewhere. Two are strictly narrative, and the

¹ See First English Life of Henry V, pp. xliii, xlv.

² See Lydgate's Minor Poems, p. xlvii, ed. H. MacCracken.

³ Bishop Percy's Folio MS. ii. 166.

⁴ Chronicles of London, pp. 119-22; Wright, ii. 123-7.

⁵ p. 72. ⁶ p. 22; cf. Memorials of Henry V, p. 80.

⁷ 'Our king went forth to Normandy,' ap. Nicolas, Battle of Agincourt, Appendix, pp. 67, 68. ⁸ Brut, p. 582; cf. p. 600.

other two are rather satirical on the treachery and discomfiture of Duke Philip. All four appear to be in the fullest sense contemporary. Of the narrative pieces the first is perhaps the best and most spirited of all the fifteenth-century ballads: ¹

Remember how ye laid siege with great pride and boast
To Calais, that little town; the number of your host
Was a hundred thousand and fifty to reckon by the polls,
As it was that same time founden by your rolls;
And yet for all your great host, early neither late
Calais was so feared of you, they shut never a gate.

Both this and the other narrative ballad, ² which comes from Cotton. MS. Galba E ix, are full of graphic and interesting detail of real value. The early date of the second of these narrative ballads is proved by the quotation of the final lines in the Libel of English Policy. ³

Of the two satirical ballads, one which begins

Thou Philip, founder of new falsehood,
Disturber of peace, captain of cowardice, is imperfect. ⁴ It may have been written in 1435 on the occasion of Philip's abandonment of the English alliance; or it may have gone on to describe the siege of the following year. It is certainly very similar in character to the fourth ballad ⁵, which is said to have been written on the latter occasion, 'in despite of the Flemings', but is rather aimed at Philip himself, and ends scornfully:

What hast thou won with all thy business,
And all thy tents to Calais carried down,

Thy cowardly flight, cockney of a champioun,
Which durst not fight, and canst so well maligne.

¹ Brut, pp. 582-4: it was first printed in Archaeologia, xxxiii. 130-2.

² Wright, Political Poems, ii. 151-6.

³ Little wote the fool,
Who might chese
What harm it were
Good Calais to lese.

Compare the Libel:

For little weneth the fool, who so might chese,
What harm it were good Calais for to lese.

See Wright, u.s. ii. 156, 192.

⁴ Id. ii. 148, 149.

⁵ Brut, pp. 600, 601; Dr. MacCracken claims it for Lydgate: see Minor Poems of Lydgate, p. xvii; and Anglia, xxxiii. 283.

The French war gave no further occasion for triumph. The next incident for the ballad-maker was the downfall of Eleanor Cobham. The Lamentacion of the Duchess of Gloucester appears in the commonplace book of Richard Hill, which was written much later; but the poem itself may be of contemporary date.¹ With this may be coupled the poem on The Mutability of Worldly Changes,² which moralizes on the fates of Eleanor Cobham, John Beaufort, Duke of Somerset, and Humphrey of Gloucester; this also exists only in a sixteenth-century copy, but seems to have been written about 1460; it gives a dubious story as to the grounds of the charge against Gloucester. Both these pieces are rather literary exercises than political poems or ballads. Their historical allusions are only incidental, and they are more interesting than important.

The only other political poems of the fifth decade are Lydgate's verses On the Prospect of Peace, and On the Truce of 1444.³ Probably they were written to order in support of the foreign policy of the Court party. They certainly do not reflect any strong public opinion. It was the mismanagement of the war, and not its continuance, which stirred popular feeling.

The next group of poems (they are rude satires, not ballads) centre round the loss of the English possessions in France and the downfall of Suffolk and his unpopular colleagues.⁴ Most of them come from a Collection⁵ made by a London citizen in or about 1452. The earliest of the series is in the form of an attack on William Boothe,⁶ Bishop of Lichfield, who was Chancellor to Queen Margaret, and is said to have owed his advancement to Suffolk.⁷ Boothe is accused of having obtained his see by simony: Suffolk is elsewhere charged with having disposed of bishoprics from corrupt motives.⁸ Whilst the main subject of this poem is the attack on Boothe,

¹ Wright, u.s. ii. 205-8; and Songs and Carols from Richard Hill's Balliol MS. 354, pp. 115-17, E.E.T.S., 1907.

² See pp. 394-7 below.

³ Wright, u.s. ii. 209-20.

⁴ There were no doubt many squibs in doggerel verse circulated at this time: see two instances on pp. 359, 370 below.

⁵ Cotton. Roll, ii. 23. See pp. 357-60 below.

⁶ Wright, u.s. ii. 225-9.

⁷ Id. ii. 232.

⁸ Croyland Chronicle, ap. Gale, Scriptores, i. 521.

and the corruption of the government, other ministers are also censured: Trevilian for his falsehood, and Suffolk for his ambition:

The Pole is so parlyus men for to passe,
That fewe can escape it of the banck riale.
But set under suger he shewithe hem galle:
Witness of Humphrey, Henry and Johan,
Whiche late were on lyve, and now be they goon.

These lines refer to Humphrey of Gloucester, Cardinal Beaufort, and John Holland, Duke of Exeter (a grandson of John of Gaunt), who all died in 1447. Boothe was consecrated in July of that same year. The poem may be as early as 1448, or even as the autumn of 1447.

The second of the series in point of time is the Warning to King Henry.¹ Suffolk is accused of having sold Normandy; if the commons do not help the King, he will bear the crown. The King is warned against his ministers, and in particular against Daniel and Saye; the traitors will never be true, they are all sworn together to hold fast like brothers. They had impoverished him for their own profit:

So pore a kyng was never seene,
Nor richere lordes alle bydene.

Henry himself seems to be excused: 'the King knoweth not alle.' The date was probably the end of 1449.

The *Verses against the Duke of Suffolk*² belong clearly to the same time. He must go, or the land is lost:

Hong up such menne to oure soverayne lorde,
That ever counselde hym with fals men to be accorde.

So also do the Verses on the popular discontent at the disasters in France,³ which begin, 'The Rote is dead.' From the reference to the loss of Rouen they must be later than October 1449. The lines

And he is bounden that oure dore should kepe,
That is Talbot our goode dogge,

¹ Wright, u.s. ii. 229-31.

² Id. ii. 231.

³ Id. ii. 221-3. They were first printed in Excerpta Historica, pp. 159-62, in 1831. See also Paston Letters, i. 66, 67, where they are best annotated. They are also printed in Trevelyan Papers, i. 65-74 (Camden Soc.), together with the verses on Bishop Boothe and 'Jack Napes soule'.

no doubt allude to the fact that Talbot had been given as a hostage to the French when Rouen was surrendered. The various personages of the time are satirized or described by their cognizances. The final lines, which refer to Richard of York, show to what direction popular opinion was turning :

The Faukoun fleyth, and hath no rest,
Tille he witte where to bigge his nest.

The lines 'Now is the Fox driven to hole' ¹ must have been written after Suffolk's arrest on January 28, 1450; and since he was still in the Tower, before his removal to Westminster on the 9th of March. The writer rejoices that Suffolk (the Fox of the south) is in the Tower, 'if he creep out he will you all undo'; it was he who with his clog ² had tied Talbot our good dog, and who at Bury slew our great gander. Suffolk was popularly accused of the death of Humphrey of Gloucester, though his enemies did not venture to include the charge in the formal indictment.

The final, most vigorous and virulent poem of this series is not included in the Cottonian Collection. Suffolk left England on May 1, was intercepted by the Nicholas of the Tower in the Channel, and executed on the following day. A poet of the popular party hailed the event with savage glee: all the dead man's friends were bidden to come and assist in performing

For Jack Napes soule, Placebo and Dirige.³

It is an extraordinary demonstration of the depth of political hatred, though in a narrower way it is chiefly useful as a list, with some pungent personal touches, of the adherents of the Court party. In one manuscript ⁴ it is described as made by the commons of Kent at the time of Cade's rising.

The early years of the Wars of the Roses have left us no popular poetry except some pieces which comment in a general

¹ Wright, u.s. ii. 224-5.

² An ape's clog was Suffolk's badge: hence in some of these poems he is called Jack Napes.

³ Wright, u.s. ii. 232-4, from Cotton. MS. Vespasian B xvi; this version has 72 lines. Another version in Political, Religious, and Love Poems, pp. 6-11, from Lambeth MS. 306, has 116 lines: the longer version is also printed in Three Fifteenth Century Chronicles, pp. 99-103, with notes.

⁴ Lambeth 306.

way on the abuses of the time, the evils of maintenance, the prevalence of violence and disorder, and the miscarriage of justice. A poem of this description with the refrain 'For now the bysom¹ leads the blind' was certainly written before August 1456,² but is probably not much earlier. Another poem of similar date attributes all the evils to 'Meed'. Others satirize extravagance, and the 'many laws and little right'.³ But it is impossible to date such productions precisely.

The great reconciliation of 1458, when the King and Queen and Yorkist leaders all joined in a procession of thanksgiving at St. Paul's on March 25, gave a London poet the opportunity to rejoice at the prospect of peace.⁴ His verses may afford some evidence of the existence of Lancastrian sympathies in the capital. Another poem, which belongs to the same year, strikes a stronger note. It is remarkable as the only poem definitely on the Lancastrian side which has been preserved. In its form it is an allegory on The Ship of State,⁵ and is of more than usual literary merit. The King is the ship, and the various Lancastrian leaders are described as the parts of the ship: thus the Earl of Shrewsbury is called the top-mast 'who keepeth the ship from harm and blame'.

Steer well the good ship, God be our guide,

This noble ship made of good tree,
Our sovereign lord King Henry,
God guide him in adversity
Where that he go or ride.

The Ship of State was written when the prospects of Lancaster were most hopeful. The events of 1460-1, which culminated in the triumph of York, produced a series of poems on the other side. This series begins with two pieces, which were probably intended to prepare the way for the return of the Yorkist leaders in July 1460.

In the early summer of 1460 the Earls of March, Warwick, and Salisbury, who were at Calais, entered into communication with their friends in Kent, and when they knew the true

¹ A blind man.

² Id. ii. 238-42, 251-3.

³ Archaeologia, xxix. 326-30.

⁴ Wright, u.s. ii. 235-7.

⁵ Id. ii. 254-6.

hearts of the people determined to cross over to England. Shortly before their coming there was a Ballad set upon the gates of the City of Canterbury.¹ The writer takes for his text the words of Isaiah,² 'the whole head is sick and the whole heart faint.' England was divided against herself, and being brought to destruction. King Henry was impoverished, and his rule could not endure; he had banished his true blood. All England mourned for those that were hence.

Send home, most gracious lord Jesu most benign,
 Send home thy true blood unto his proper vein
 Richard, Duke of York, Job thy servant insign,
 Whom Satan not ceaseth to set at care and disdain.

The writer prays also for the return of the Earls of March, of Salisbury, and of Warwick, 'shield of our defence'. He hints that Henry's son was a false heir, born in false wedlock; a venomous slander, which Warwick had fostered. It is probable enough that this ballad was inspired by the Yorkist leaders as part of their propaganda.

Another piece,³ of the same date but of London origin, describes how the writer walking down Cheapside saw a woman embroidering letters, which he proceeds to expound:

Y. for York that is manly and mightful

W. for Warwick, good with shield and other defence,
 The boldest under banner in battle to abide.

The glorification of Warwick in the poetry of this time is very apparent. He is, with the Earl of March, the hero of the ballad of The Bearward and the Bear,⁴ which celebrates the Yorkist victory at Northampton. The framework of the ballad is allegorical. The Bearward (Edward, Earl of March) and the Bear (Warwick) went to chase the Dogs (Shrewsbury, Beaumont, and Egremont) and the Buck (Buckingham).

The game was done in a little stound,
 The Buck was slain and borne away;
 Against the Bear there was no hound,
 But he might sport and take his play.

¹ Davies's Chronicle, pp. 91-4.

³ Archasologia, xxix. 330-4.

² Isaiah i. 5.

⁴ Id. xxix. 334-40.

The Bear and Bearward save The Hunt (King Henry), and beg him not to take their act unkindly. The Hunt replies that the Buck and the Dogs had brought him into distress : ' I followed after, I wist not why.' Then the Hunt is brought reverently to London, over which the Eagle (Salisbury) had meantime hovered watchfully. Herein we see the desire of the Yorkist leaders up to this point to preserve the semblance of loyalty, and to dissociate Henry from his advisers. The poem ends with a prayer that God may ' bring home the Master of this Game, the Duke of York . . . Richard by name '. From this it is clear that the ballad was written before Richard came over from Ireland in October. The recognition of Richard as Protector seemed to confirm his triumph, but a Yorkist poet warned his leaders not to be too trustful ; for those who now spoke fair, were as false as ever : ¹

They say in their assemble, it is a wonder thing
To see the Rose in winter so fresh for to spring ;
And many barked at Bear that now be full still,
Yet they will him worry, if they might have their fill.

The terror in London after the victory of the Lancastrians, with their northern army, at St. Albans on Shrove Tuesday, February 17, 1461, the relief with which Edward was welcomed and acknowledged as King, and the triumph of the Yorkists at Towton inspired another fine ballad, The Rose of Rouen.² The writer was clearly a Londoner :

Upon a Shrove Tuesday, on a green leed
Betwixt Sandridge and St. Albans many man gan bleed :
On an Ash Wednesday we lived in mickle dread ;
Then came the Rose of Rouen down to help us in our need.

These last three pieces are all of a high degree of merit, and have a certain similarity of form which suggests that they may be the work of one writer.

Some pleasant verses of the same date, which begin

Sithe God hathe chose the to be his knyght, are noteworthy only for their expression of thankfulness for Edward's victory.³

¹ Id. xxix. 340-2.

² Id. xxix. 343-7. Edward IV was born at Rouen.

³ Archaeologia, xxix. 130, from Lambeth MS. 306.

It was a less practised hand than the author of the Rose of Rouen who a little later reviewed the whole situation from the point of view of the successful party in a piece, which Wright styled A Political Retrospect.¹ The dethroning of Richard II, whose reign was 'abundant with plenty of wealth and earthly joy', is described as a great wrong. Henry of Derby won the crown by force and perjury; he killed Scrope 'the blessed confessor', and by the judgement of God was smitten with leprosy. Henry V, though he reigned unrightfully, was the best of his line and upheld the honour of England. Henry of Windsor by great folly brought all into languor. In his days through false treason the good Duke of Gloucester was done to death; since which time there had been great mourning in England, with many a sharp shower. Woe unto the land where the King was unwise or innocent! Queen Margaret had endeavoured to rule all England, and would have destroyed the right line: she would have brought the country to confusion, not scrupling in the pursuit of her ends to make use of the help of foreigners. King Edward had appeared to be England's comforter, and banish the black clouds of languor. His threefold victories at Northampton, Mortimer's Cross, and Towton, were a sign of God's favour. In the support of his right the Earl of Warwick, 'lodestar of knighthood,' had ever been foremost. This is an excellent statement of the interpretation put upon the history of the previous sixty years by the bias of the Yorkists.

Ten years later *The Recovery of the Throne by Edward IV*² describes at length the return of the King, his march to London, and victory at Barnet. The battle of Tewkesbury is passed over, and the poem ends with a detailed account of the defeat of the Bastard of Fauconberg's attack on London, which is the most useful part of it. The writer was no doubt a London citizen. Though the poem adds little to the official narrative of The Arrival,³ it is interesting for some personal touches. Earl Rivers, by his share in the defence of London, 'purchased great love of the commons'. Richard of Gloucester, 'young of age and victorious in battle,' was the chosen husband of fortune. Hastings, the Chamberlain, had 'failed his master neither in storm nor stour'.

¹ Wright, u.s. ii. 267-70, from Society of Antiquaries MS. 101.

² Id. ii. 271-82; from Royal MS. 17 D xv.

³ See p. 175 above.

The later years of Edward IV furnished the ballad-makers with no suitable themes. Under Richard III the fate which overtook William Collyngbourne for the couplet which he posted on the doors of St. Paul's¹—

The Cat, the Rat, and Lovel our dog Rule all England under a hog—would be a warning to other versifiers. But Richard's downfall was naturally attractive to writers of the early Tudor period. Their productions, which were probably not committed to writing till long after the date of their original composition, have survived only in late and altered copies. But even in their present form they preserve genuine contemporary material.

The earliest as regards the date of its subject is a ballad on the Betrayal of Buckingham by Banister.² Its description of how Banister lived to an old age of misery and shame points to its original composition having been as late as the early part of the sixteenth century; on the other hand, it is not likely to have been much later.³

Of more interest are two ballads which were originally composed by minstrels in the service of the Stanleys. *The Rose of England*⁴ is put in an allegorical form so similar to that of the ballads of 1460-1 as to justify the belief that at all events it preserved the same literary tradition. Since it praises Sir William Stanley, it is not very likely that its original composition was later than Stanley's execution in 1495. England is described as a fair garden with a beautiful red rose-tree. There came a beast called a Boar, who 'rooted this garden up and down', and tore the rose-tree asunder. But a sprig of the Rose (Henry Tudor) was preserved, and returning to England with the Blue Boar (the Earl of Oxford) sent for help to the old Eagle (Lord Stanley). Together they

¹ Fabyan, p. 672.

² Bishop Percy's Folio MS. ii. 255-9.

³ Hall, Chronicle, p. 395, has a similar story of Banister's evil end: the ballad may possibly have borrowed from this source; if so it will be comparatively late.

⁴ Bishop Percy's Folio MS. iii. 187-96.

won the victory, the Earl of Oxford being in particular distinguished for his skill in manœuvring Henry's army :

The Blue Boar the vanward had,
He was both wary and wise of wit ;
The right hand of them he took
The sun and wind of them to get.

This is an historical touch which we do not get elsewhere. Another is the story of Master Mitton, the bailiff of Shrewsbury, who refused to admit Henry, but was pardoned by him for his loyalty to his charge.

A much longer and more important piece is The Song of the Lady Bessy,¹ which has survived in several versions. The variation of these versions is probably due to the fact that the poem had been long current before it was put in writing. The Song is poetical both in its construction and its development, and much of the idea and the detail is due to the author's imagination. As a literary work it is 'well constructed, vivid, dramatic, and marked by an epic breadth of treatment'. Still, underlying its poetic form, there is a solid base of fact, though it is not always easy to disentangle the truth.² From the part which Humphrey Brereton plays in the story it has been conjectured that he was the actual author. In any case the Song was certainly the work of some one who had a good knowledge of the events which he describes. At the latest the original must have been composed in the early years of the sixteenth century.

The Lady Bessy is Elizabeth, daughter of Edward IV. The song begins by describing how she was importuned by her uncle Richard to become his Queen. But Richard had murdered her brothers, and rather than wed with him she would be burnt on Tower Hill. She would marry no one but the Earl of Richmond. In her trouble she appeals to Lord Stanley, who is by an anachronism called Earl of Derby.

¹ Two versions are given in The most pleasant Song of the Lady Bessy, edited by J. O. Halliwell for the Percy Society in 1847. For a third, see Bishop Percy's Folio MS. iii. 319-63. Bosworth Field in the latter collection (iii. 235-9) is only a variant of the same original.

² See the criticisms by Professor Firth in Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, 3rd Series, ii. 23-6, and by Dr. Gairdner, Life and Reign of Richard III, ed. 1878, pp. 401-19.

Stanley at first refuses to help her : King Richard was his lord, and they would both be undone if they were discovered. Elizabeth then declares that she knew that the tyrant intended to destroy the Stanleys, as he had destroyed Buckingham. Still Stanley is obdurate. But at last he is overcome by her distress and manifest sincerity. Then Elizabeth and Stanley together plan a great conspiracy : the Princess writes letters to their friends at Stanley's dictation, and Humphrey Brereton, an old servant of King Edward, is sent to deliver them. The conspirators meet at Stanley's house in London, and Brereton is chosen to take their message to the Earl of Richmond. Brereton does not know the earl, but by good fortune a fellow countryman from Cheshire was porter at Begbarnes Abbey, where Henry then dwelt. The porter tells Brereton how to recognize the Prince of England, who, dressed in black velvet, was shooting at the butts with three of his lords ; the Prince had a long pale face, with a wart a little above the chin :

His face is white, the wart is red,
Thereby you may him ken.

This and other minute details as to Brereton's errands seem to bear the stamp of personal knowledge, and furnish the ground for the suggestion that he was the author of the Song. Certainly they leave us in no doubt as to the good quality of the material on which it was based. The principal share which the Lady Bessy is made to take in organizing the conspiracy is an obvious poetical invention. But our other information is so scanty that we cannot tell exactly how much truth there may be in the story.

To return to the Song Henry sends back word that he will cross the sea for the Lady Bessy. He lands at Milford Haven, is joined by the Stanleys, and marches to Bosworth. Lord Stanley had, however, been forced to leave his son, Lord Strange, as a hostage with the King. Strange is in danger of his life, and is only saved at the last minute by the imminence of Richard's own peril, which compels him to postpone his vengeance. The battle is won by the help of the Stanleys :

There may no man their strokes abide,
The Stanleys' dints they be so strong.

Richard is urged to take horse and flee, but makes answer :

Give me my battle-axe in my hand,
And set my crown on my head so high,
For by him that made both sun and moon,
King of England this day I will die.

This is an historic touch, but the concluding scene is happily apocryphal. When Richard's dead body is brought naked to Leicester, the Lady Bessy meets it with bitter reviling :

How like you the killing of my brethren dear?
Welcome, gentle uncle, home!

The Song of the Lady Bessy is very interesting as an example of how early ballads are compacted of truth and fiction; and also as showing, through its varying versions, how ballads composed for recitation and transmitted from mouth to mouth are changed in the process before they are set down in writing. Of the extant copies of the Song the oldest is no earlier than the reign of Elizabeth,¹ and one is as late as that of Charles II. It is further of interest as an early specimen of the work of a professional minstrel in the service of a great feudal family. The Stanley cycle of ballads did not of course stand alone. As another instance we have a Percy cycle, including the famous though unhistorical Chevy Chase. A poet in the employment of the Percy family, though he was not a ballad-maker, was William Peeris. He was secretary to Henry, fifth Earl of Northumberland (d. 1527), for whom he wrote a metrical Chronicle of the family of Percy.² Its interest is, however, chiefly genealogical, and it contains nothing of importance for general history.

¹ Harley MS. 367, ff. 89-100.

² Ed. J. Besley in 1845, from a transcript in the Dodsworth MSS. in the Bodleian Library; the original is contained in Royal MS. 18 B ii at the British Museum. For other copies see Reports of Hist. MSS. Commission, ii, 6 and iii, 108.

CHAPTER X

SIXTEENTH-CENTURY HISTORIANS AND FIFTEENTH-CENTURY HISTORY

IN the previous chapters an endeavour has been made, on the one hand, to estimate the value of existing sources for the history of the fifteenth century in England, and on the other hand to trace the gradual development of their literary form. On neither point, as already explained,¹ is it possible to stop short at the end of the period to which our inquiry strictly relates. It will have been obvious in how large a degree opinion on fifteenth-century history was long dependent on the information given by writers of the next age, and in how many cases the original sources of that information have only recently come to light. The process of re-discovery is indeed hardly yet complete. If it were only as a study of 'sources' it would not be possible to leave unnoticed the great Chronicles of Hall, Stow, and Holinshed. Still more necessary is it to pass them under review if we are to understand fully the character of the literary development which made them possible.

The value of Fabyan's Chronicle and of More's History of Richard III has already been discussed; since though written in the sixteenth century, they treat exclusively of our period, and belong essentially to the class of original authorities. So also I have dealt shortly with Polydore Vergil's Anglica Historia in so far as it may be considered to contain first-hand information for events before 1485. This is, however, only an incidental feature in Vergil's work, and is of much less importance than the influence which he exercised in the development of historical literature in England. Nowhere else is a new departure in historical method so clearly marked, and the model which Vergil set was adopted more or less consciously by his successors.

¹ See p. 11 above.

Polydore Vergil was an Italian scholar who came to England in 1502 and lived in this country with some intervals for nearly fifty years. At the command of Henry VII he began to write a history of England, which was far advanced towards completion by 1516, though the first edition (ending in 1509) did not appear till 1534. A second edition was published in 1546, and a third with a continuation to 1538 in 1555.

As an original authority, Polydore Vergil's work, which he styled Anglica Historia, is of the greatest value for the reigns of Henry VII and Henry VIII. During our own period it is only in the latest years that we must seek in it for any new information. Till at all events the beginning of the reign of Edward IV it was of necessity a mere compilation. It has many errors of chronology, and does not incorporate anything material which is not to be found elsewhere. Nevertheless in view of its literary importance and the use which was made of it by later writers, and particularly by Hall, it is desirable to inquire into the sources on which it is based. Incidentally we shall obtain some information as to the material which was available to a diligent student at the beginning of the sixteenth century. It is, however, unfortunate that Vergil, though he sometimes makes comparisons between the discordant statements which he found in his authorities, never specifies precisely the source from which his information was derived.

For the reign of Henry IV Polydore Vergil followed for the most part the French narratives of Froissart and Monstrelet; the only English authorities with which he appears to have been acquainted are Fabyan and the Brut; both the latter were of course available in printed copies. In the next reign the use of Monstrelet is less prominent; the greatest part seems to be derived from Tito Livio, either directly or through the medium of the Pseudo-Elmham.¹ Vergil occasionally gives something of which the source seems to be doubtful; as for Scrope's plot in 1415. The history of the early years of Henry VI is very imperfect ; it is devoted chiefly to the war, which is described from Monstrelet and supplemented from some other French source.¹ For the Parliament of 1433 an English source must have been used, and the notices of the commercial legislation of 1439-40 and other minor incidents in England may come from either Fabyan or the Brut.² When about 1450 the interest of the Anglica Historia begins to increase, its value consists not in its description of events, but in its presentment of the opinion of fifty years later, which Vergil's influence was to get rooted in our historical literature. Henry VI, the saint of Lancastrian tradition, is described as 'a man of mild and plain-dealing disposition : to be short, there was not in this world a more pure, more honest, and more holy creature'.³ Margaret of Anjou, whom Tudor historians had no call to defend, appears as 'a woman of sufficient forecast, very desirous of renown', who from her first coming to England was egged on by others 'to take on hand with her husband to rule the realm'.⁴ Suffolk has to suffer for the claims which made his grandsons ill-favoured by the Tudor kings ; he was 'the principal contriver of that devilish device to kill the Duke of Gloucester', and 'the utter confusion and destruction of his country', the hateful minister who was the Queen's evil genius.⁵ Edmund Beaufort, who was great-uncle to Henry VII, comes in for praise, and Richard of York for blame.⁶ As before, Vergil takes his facts chiefly from Fabyan or the Brut. With the more original matter given in the history of the Yorkist kings I have already dealt.⁷

¹ The mention of Gloucester at Harfleur in 1415 points to the Pseudo-Elmham (Vita, p. 42); the description of Henry V at Mantes in 1419 as 'visae puellae forma captus' to Livio (Vita, p. 75); but the latter might come from the Latin Brut (see p. 354 below). Cf. Anglica Historia, pp. 443, 453, ed. 1557.

It will be obvious that Polydore Vergil's range of knowledge for the history of the fifteenth century was very limited, and so far as affairs in England were concerned hardly extended beyond the printed Chronicle of Fabyan and the Brut. It must, however, be remembered that other native sources of an independent character had but a small circulation, and that the rare copies of them still lay buried in monastic libraries. The limitation of his knowledge and the time at which he

¹ Cf. English Translation, pp. 36, 37.

² Id. p. 70.

⁶ Id. pp. 87, 96.

⁴ Id. p. 71.

⁷ See pp. 190-92 above.

² Id. pp. 46, 62, 63.

⁵ Id. pp. 74, 52.

wrote has given a prejudice to Vergil's narrative. But the interpretation which he was led to place upon events is of importance, since it was in great part adopted by his successors.

For our present purpose the method which Vergil practised in the Anglica Historia is of more interest than its contents. 'It was', writes Dom Gasquet, 'a great advance undoubtedly in the literary form of telling the story of a nation on anything which had gone before—at least in England. Vergil gave a consecutive readable story, using his materials and weaving them into a narrative on the lines of the modern historian rather than on those of the old English chroniclers.'¹

Polydore Vergil himself explained his aims in writing in the dedicatory epistle which he addressed to Henry VIII with the first edition of his history. But he did so more fully in an earlier draft, which has only recently come to light. He there puts so clearly the difference between his own methods and those of his predecessors that it must be quoted at length :

'I consider that of the various annals those written by the monks William of Malmesbury and Matthew Paris should be accounted true histories. I call those which were composed of old by monks who were wont to engage in such writing in English monasteries mere annals, and in such records bald statements of events are sometimes made inconsistent with other statements and not unfrequently mingled with obvious errors. Reports of things that have taken place, as they were talked about on the highways, were noted down by the monks in their solitudes from the descriptions of travellers and from popular rumour which reached them. Such annals, long neglected and dust-covered, William of Malmesbury and Matthew Paris have utilized and called their own. Still, from their own histories and from those of foreign countries that have had relations with England any one who did not mind the labour could get material for a proper history.'

After explaining the motives which had induced him to undertake this task, Polydore Vergil then proceeds thus :

'I first began to spend the hours of my night and day in searching the pages of English and foreign histories . . . I spent six whole years in reading those annals and histories, during which, imitating the bees which laboriously gather their honey from every flower, I collected with discretion material proper for a true history. When, on approaching our own times, I could find no such annals (for indeed by the careless spirit of our age none such exist), I betook myself to every man of age who was pointed out to me as having been formerly occupied in important and public affairs, and from all such I obtained information about events up to the year 1500. From that time—since I came to England immediately after that date—I have myself noted down, day by day, everything of importance.’¹

¹ Transactions of the Royal Historical Society, 2nd Series, xvi. 3.

This is not less sound as a criticism of mediaeval writers on history than it is interesting as a statement of the very different methods which Polydore Vergil himself adopted. In this introduction, he explains further that he had not desired to show more than a sufficiency of learning, and had of set purpose ‘made use of a simple style by which light is best thrown on difficult matters’. He had written, he says, as an Italian (i.e. as an outside observer), telling everything without fear or bias, and avoiding alike partiality and calumnious reports. He is conscious that he cannot have escaped error, but trusts ‘that at least out of the vast mass of annals, I have prepared material for others who after me may wish to write our history in a more elegant way’.²

Vergil seems to have anticipated that his treatment of English history might provoke criticism. His rejection of Geoffrey of Monmouth as an untrustworthy writer who mingled truth with fiction, stirred Leland to patriotic wrath, whilst even Sir Henry Savile censured him as a stranger to our affairs, whose history was both faulty and meagre. Caius alleged that Vergil had burnt the manuscripts of ancient historians in order that his own errors might pass undiscovered. In later times Gale and Wood told a story that he had borrowed books from the University Library in Oxford and never restored them, and had at other places pillaged libraries at his pleasure and sent a whole ship-load of manuscripts to Rome.³ Such exaggerated charges refute themselves, though the tradition may be evidence of Polydore Vergil's zeal in the search for material. As for his use of his material no one will now question that he had exercised a discrimination in advance of his time. Savile thought the Historia to be 'exiliter sane et jejune conscripta'. As regards the narrative for the first part of the fifteenth century the criticism might not be unfair. But even after the lapse of four hundred years the historian of to-day may justly bewail the poverty of the original chronicles which are available for this period, and for all his industry Vergil's opportunities must have been much less. It was not without reason that he lamented the lack of material as he approached his own times. We have to be thankful for the pains which he took to supplement it from the opinions and memories of those who were still alive. If a narrative so composed was coloured inevitably by current prejudices, the blame cannot be laid altogether at his door.

¹ Id. xvi. 10, 11. This comes from a manuscript draft of the Historia, written about 1516 and now in the Vatican Library.

² Id. xvi. 13.

³ These and other criticisms are conveniently brought together by Sir Henry Ellis in his Introduction to the English Translation of the Anglica Historia, edited for the Camden Society in 1844. To them may be added Stow's adverse criticism in Annales, p. 7.

It is not, however, so much for what he wrote (at least in the earlier part of his work) as for his manner of doing it that Polydore Vergil is a noteworthy name in English historiography. Even his detractor Humphrey Llwyd (d. 1568) admitted that Vergil's History was in all men's hands. It was impossible that with the example of so popular a work before them later writers should have failed to profit by the model which it afforded, or to make it their endeavour to gather material from the best sources available and weave it into a reasoned and consistent whole.

To Polydore Vergil belongs the credit of having been the first to break publicly in England with the long tradition of a purely annalistic form of history. Yet he did but give expression to ideas that were in the air. Before ever Polydore Vergil's labours had borne any visible fruit, the History of Richard III had been told with a narrative skill which could not be excelled. If in that work literary finish is a more pre-eminent quality than the discriminate sifting of material, we find in other quarters recognition of the humbler duties of the historian. The 'Translator of Livius' was not content simply to turn into English a book which served well his purpose, but supplemented it from other sources and was careful to add in the margin from what authority every sentence was taken.¹ In the accomplishment of his task he showed that he was not without the critical sense, even though it be but of a simple order. When to this we add the didactic character of his work, and its definite aim to derive instruction for the present from the lessons of the past, it must be admitted that we have in him the making of an historian of far better quality than the great majority of those with whom we have had to deal. Not less memorable is it that he chose to write in 'rude and homely English, from whom all pratique (or experience) and famous inditing is far exiled'. In this he displays at once his desire to give a literary form to his work, and his consciousness of the difficulties that lay before him. It is not surprising that one who began to write in such a spirit of modesty should have ended better than he hoped. Before his time no considerable history had been composed in English with so definite a literary intention. We may claim for him with justice that he was one of the first to grasp the truth that the native speech of England was the proper medium in which to tell her history. Without the literary instrument which he, and others like him, helped to forge, the example of Polydore Vergil's improved historical method must have been less fruitful. Though it was natural for Vergil, as a scholar and a foreigner, to write in Latin, no genuine historical literature could have been created whilst the use of a dead language continued. There could be no better proof that Latin was already obsolete than the speedy translation of the Anglica Historia into our native tongue. Grafton, in the prose continuation which he added to his edition of Hardyng's Chronicle in 1543, translated his account of the reign of Edward IV from Polydore Vergil's work, and when More failed him that of Richard III as well. A few years later another independent and complete translation was made, though none of it was printed until Sir Henry Ellis edited a part of it for the Camden Society some sixty years ago.²

¹ First English Life of Henry the Fifth, p. 3.

² The three books which cover the period from 1422 to 1485 in 1844; the first part to the Norman Conquest in 1846. Grafton and Hall had followed

We thus perceive that in the early years of the sixteenth century causes were at work which must tend to the creation of a sounder method of history, and of a better medium for its expression. If, however, Polydore Vergil and the 'Translator of Livius' wrote with a deliberate intention, the improvement which they helped to bring about was no sudden change, but was the result of a long process of gradual development. Tito Livio had sought to weave the material derived from older writers into a readable and consecutive whole. In his Vita Henrici Quinti, only less than in the Anglica Historia of Polydore Vergil, can we trace the influence in England of classical and Italian models. If the Pseudo-Elmham had an inferior taste in literary workmanship, he must at all events be credited with the desire to do better. The Croyland Chronicler, again, was conscious of the drawbacks under which monks writing in solitudes laboured,¹ and in his own history produced a critical and reasoned account of events which he had himself witnessed or in which he had himself taken part. The very fact that in the monastic houses the practice (and still more the art) of writing history had so decayed is itself eloquent of change. Those into whose hands the writing of contemporary history fell were men who lived in the world and were themselves conversant with the events which they recorded. Though the London Chronicles were cramped by an exaggerated annalistic form, the Brut which resulted from them was intended to be read with pleasure. The Brut itself not only furnished later writers with much of their material, but helped to foster the taste for history and to mould English prose as its proper medium.

The change in the character of English historical literature was the outcome of a change in the springs of intellectual activity. Monasteries had ceased to be the conspicuous homes of learning. With the growth of national consciousness the political capital became more and more the centre of national thought and popular opinion. It was this which made the Chronicles of London more than a civic record, at the same the 1534 edition of the Anglica Historia; the translation depends on that of 1546.

¹ See his criticism of his predecessor, quoted on p. 180 above.

time when those histories (such as they are) which were composed elsewhere tended always to a narrower and provincial outlook. The movement which had thus begun, as it were unobserved, received a manifest stimulus through the invention of printing and the coming of the Literary Renaissance. It was therefore a ripe soil to which the dispersal of ancient libraries, through the destruction of the monasteries, brought the opportunity of a fertile crop. In their humble way the compilers of the London Chronicles and of the Brut had prepared the ground for the noteworthy group of sixteenth-century historians, who wrote for London publishers and had at their command a wide class of interested readers. As a printed work Fabyan's Chronicle stands first in point of time; but if Fabyan was in appearance the first of the London historians of the sixteenth century, he was in reality only the last of the fifteenth-century chroniclers. Here he concerns us only as the link between the two. Our interest is with Hall, Stow, and Holinshed. Though they were not, of course, the only historical writers of their age, they stand out from their fellows as the three who contributed in a pre-eminent degree to create the literary history of the fifteenth century. To them, therefore, I shall confine my attention.

Edward Hall, who had been educated at Eton and King's College, Cambridge, was a barrister of Gray's Inn, and common serjeant of the city of London. He was under fifty years of age when he died in 1547, so was emphatically a man of the new era. He had sat in Parliament as a supporter of the political and religious policy of Henry VIII, and it was in this spirit that he wrote his history, which he styled The Union of the two Noble and Illustre Families of Lancastre and Yorke.¹ It was intended as a glorification of the House of Tudor, and its dramatic conception is revealed in its title. Written with a purpose it is inevitably coloured by preconceptions; but that purpose gives it form and enhances its literary merit, which is of a high order. It was, of course, even more than Polydore Vergil's Historia, a compilation. Hall borrowed much from Vergil, by whom no doubt he was influenced also in the form of his writing. But he wrote on a larger scale and carried his researches further. He mentions amongst his authorities Polichronicon, Polidorus, and Gauguinus (Gaguin) in Latin; Monstrelet, Jean Mayer de Belges, Argenton (i.e. Philippe de Comines), and Cronique de Normandie in French; Trevisa, Fabian, More, Caxton, Hardyng, John Basset,¹ Balantyne,² and the Chronicles of London in English;³ I omit some minor authorities. In his preface he speaks of one that wrote the 'Common English Chronicle',⁴ and he had certainly made good use of the Brut, whether through Caxton or through manuscript copies. Tito Livio's Vita Henrici seems to have been known to him only through the medium of Polydore Vergil.

¹ First edition in 1542, second edition in 1548.

Hall commonly followed Vergil where it served him. But his list of authorities is well justified by his text, which shows that he used other sources than those which he named. For the fall of Richard II and the rising of the Earls in 1400 he derived material from the Traïson et Mort du Roy Richart.⁵ He refers to the prophecies of the Molewarp which were current in the early years of Henry IV.⁶ He also gives the Tripartite Convention at Bangor, placing it before the battle of Shrewsbury; for this he seems to have followed a Chronicle now lost.⁷ Another story from a lost source is that of the narrow escape of Henry IV from capture by a French pirate in 1406.⁸ From Basset he may have taken some details on the French war, such as the names of those whom Henry V knighted on the way to Agincourt.⁹ In his account of the death-bed of Henry Beaufort he quotes a narrative written by one John Baker, who was the Cardinal's chaplain, in which Beaufort is represented as lamenting the failure of his pursuit of riches and power.¹⁰ Another source seems to have been of a private kind. His ancestor, Davy Hall, was captain of Caen at the time of its fall in 1450, and was afterwards in

¹ See p. 68 above.

² Meaning John Bellenden's translation of the Historia Scotorum of Hector Boece, which was printed at Edinburgh in 1536.

³ Chronicle, p. viii.

⁴ Id. p. vi.

⁵ Id. pp. 14, 16-17; cf. Traïson, pp. 70, 71, 77-81.

⁶ See p. 236 above.

⁷ See p. 26 above.

⁸ Chronicle, p. 26.

⁹ Id. p. 64.

¹⁰ Id. p. 210.

the service of Richard of York, on whose side he was killed at Wakefield. The chronicler describes Davy Hall as York's chief counsellor; he may have been indebted for information on Yorkist affairs, and in particular for his excellent account of the battle of Wakefield, to material or tradition handed down in his own family.¹ Hall also preserves some details, whether of legend as in the story of how Henry of Monmouth struck the chief justice, or of more authentic facts drawn from lost documents. Two important instances of the latter class are the Articles and Arbitrament between Henry Beaufort and Humphrey of Gloucester in 1426, and the Articles which Humphrey brought against his uncle in 1440; it is only recently that better copies of these documents have been available; Hall, who seems to have used other versions than those given by Richard Arnold, may have obtained them from a London Chronicle.² It is clear that the copy of the Chronicles of London which he used was of a good type; ³ between 1430 and 1438 it must have resembled the Cleopatra Chronicle; ⁴ his account of the French war during these years was long of exceptional value as containing much that was not elsewhere available. For the reign of Edward IV Hall, whilst in the main following Polydore Vergil, supplements the narrative of that writer from other sources like the Mémoires of Philippe de Comines. Sometimes also he gives details not found elsewhere, as notably for the battles of Towton, Edgcote, and Tewkesbury, and for the Scottish war in 1482. The history of the usurpation of Richard III is borrowed avowedly from Sir Thomas More (in Grafton's version). For the latter part of Richard III Hall was again indebted to Vergil, but adds some embellishments of his own, such as the speeches of Richard III and Henry of Richmond before Bosworth.

It will be observed that there is much in Hall's Chronicle which was originally valuable and something which is still of service. But of greater importance is the spirit in which he

¹ Id. pp. 40, 188, 215, 250.

² See p. 88 above.

³ Cf. Chronicle, p. 205, where, writing of the festivities at the reception of Margaret of Anjou, he refers his readers for fuller information to the Chronicles of London and Robert Fabyan.

⁴ Cf. Chronicles of London, pp. 308-12.

wrote. His Protestant and Tudor sympathies appear early in his work, when he speaks of 'foolish and fantastical persons' who wrote of disasters befalling Henry IV through Archbishop Scrope's death,¹ and of 'proud priors and silly nuns' in his account of the alleged revival of the Lollards' Bill at the Leicester Parliament of 1414.² The long speeches which on this and similar occasions Hall puts into the mouths of Chichele and others are no doubt inventions of his own; they are literary exercises and not history. It is, however, for such interpretations of history, and for the expression of sixteenth-century opinion, that Hall's work is of most interest to us. His views and statements became the common staple of his successors, and by colouring their writings created a false opinion which long persisted. Similarly the copious use made of Monstrelet by Hall and other English writers of the sixteenth century has given a Burgundian bias to their accounts of events in France. M. Molinier complains with justice of the blind following of Monstrelet as having done much to falsify the history of the time; so that 'only in the last hundred years has the course of events been judged more intelligently'.³ The story of Joan of Arc furnishes a signal instance. The bald references of the London Chronicles and the Brut are all that appears in contemporary Chronicles of English origin. The notion of a recent French historian⁴ that there was an English legend hostile to the Maid is absolutely without foundation. Hall, and after him Stow and Holinshed, introduced her history, taken from Monstrelet, as something that would be novel to their readers and required explanation. 'The result', as Mr. Lang observed, 'was the perplexity, the chaotic uncertainty about the Maid which is so conspicuous in the dubiously Shakespearian play, Henry VI, Part I.'⁵

In Hall, as in other writers, sixteenth-century prejudices become most manifest as he approaches the Wars of the Roses. He adopts and develops the ideas of his predecessors, centring them about the myth of the Good Duke Humphrey,

¹ Chronicle, p. 35.

² Id. pp. 49-56.

³ Sources de l'histoire de France, iv. 193.

⁴ Chanoine Dunand, La Vraie Jeanne d'Arc.

⁵ Lang, The Maid of France, pp. vi, 293.

the ideal prince, who after doing service in Yorkist propaganda was accepted by Tudor tradition. Hall represents the Articles which Humphrey presented against Cardinal Beaufort in 1440 as the occasion of the attack which was subsequently made on him through Eleanor Cobham. 'The Duke of Gloucester took all these things patiently,' wrote Hall,¹ putting his own conclusion on the incident with perhaps no more warrant than he has for the assertion that Henry VI was guided by the wise counsel of his uncle till his marriage. As in Caxton's Chronicles and in Polydore Vergil, the Angevin marriage is treated as the cause of disaster; Margaret from her first coming to England, as a girl of sixteen, sets herself to undermine Humphrey's influence; Suffolk devises the conspiracy for the Duke's destruction, not unaided by Cardinal Beaufort, who now first appears as the greedy and self-seeking prelate; Margaret is 'a cancred crocodryle and subtile serpent', Suffolk not merely her evil genius but 'the Queen's darling' whom she 'entirely loved'.² So the legend is complete as adopted in the Second Part of Henry VI. The narrative to which Hall thus put the finishing touches is mere Tudor fiction based on Yorkist misrepresentation. If unworthy as history, it is of deep interest for literature. The high quality of the work in which it received its final form secured for the false setting an acceptance which was long unchallenged.

Richard Grafton, the printer, was responsible for completing Hall's Chronicle, the second edition of which was published by him in 1548. Twenty years later he produced a work of his own which he styled A Chronicle at large and meere Historye of the Affayres of England. Stow alleged that he had patched it up from Robert Fabyan and Edward Hall;³ it is a compilation of no value. Grafton's history of the reigns of Edward IV and Richard III, which he appended to his edition of Hardyng's Chronicle in 1543, has already been noticed.⁴

¹ Chronicle, p. 218.

² Id. pp. 204, 205, 207, 208, 219, 239.

³ Survey of London, i. pp. lii, liii; Grafton's Abridgment of the Chronicles of England, which appeared in 1563, is of still less value.

⁴ See pp. 185-8 above.

The Chronicle of the World,¹ which was begun by Thomas Lanquet (d. 1545) and finished by Thomas Cooper, is a compilation of no independent value. The English part seems to be based on Fabyan and Hall. Perhaps its greatest interest is that a proposed correction of it was the beginning of Stow's historical labours.²

No writer of the sixteenth century deserves to be better regarded of us than John Stow. He does not, it is true, show himself in any real sense a great historian in his Annales of England, which is no more than a chronologically exact narrative. Perhaps in that far larger work which he finished, but for which he could find no printer, he would have given us a more reasoned 'History of this Island'.³ Since, however, we must judge him by the work which has survived, I cannot do better than repeat Camden's opinion: 'His industry is praised by all, though his judgement leaves something to seek; but his work is of such quality as to entitle him to a foremost place amongst our Annalists.'⁴ We do not now need to go to Stow for judgements, but it is impossible to try to trace his narrative to its sources without some feeling of amazement for the pains and accuracy with which he had gathered and marshalled his material.

Stow was not only a zealous collector of Chronicles and memorials, but also an indefatigable searcher of Records. Herein we have something of a new departure in the art of historical inquiry. Such documents as had been used by earlier historians were commonly of the character of State Papers, which for one reason or another had been made public. But Stow's researches were of another quality. He was the first English historian to make systematic use of the Public Records for the purpose of his work. There can be few Patent Rolls of the fifteenth century⁵ from which he did not derive some information for his Survey of London. His use of such sources is only less conspicuous in the Annales.

¹ Published in 1549, 1559, 1560, and 1565.

² Survey of London, i, p. xlix.

³ Id. i, pp. xxi, lxxix.

⁴ Camdeni Epistolae, p. 12, ed. T. Smith, 1691.

⁵ And many of earlier date. See the numerous references in the Notes to my edition of the Survey, and especially vol. ii, pp. 391-7.

It is worth giving an instance by way of illustration. In 1417 he records the robberies committed in Sussex by a malefactor calling himself Friar Tuck. This has often been quoted as an early proof of the existence of the legend of Robin Hood, but the source of Stow's statement was only revealed by the Calendar of Patent Rolls in 1911.¹ Though to a less extent, Stow had also made use of other Public Records like the Close Rolls and Inquisitiones post mortem, not to mention local Records of various kinds.² Even Charters of early date were pressed into service for such a purpose as the compilation of his list of the Bishops of London; ³ the fact that some of these Charters are spurious does not affect the point.

As for Stow's familiarity with Chronicles the previous chapters will have furnished sufficient proof of the width of his reading. With the majority of the writers with whom we have had to deal he was well acquainted. In several cases the originals have perished, and are now only known through Stow's transcripts.⁴ In other cases the preservation of the originals may be due to his zeal as a collector. If for no other reason we should owe to him a deep debt of gratitude for the many monuments of the past which he helped to save from destruction.⁵ Both in this and in the use which he made of his material he did more for our knowledge of the fifteenth century than any other writer of his time.

Stow relates that his first literary interest was for poetry rather than for history. But from about 1564, 'I seeing the confused order of our late English Chronicles, and the ignorant handling of ancient affairs, consecrated myself to the search of our famous Antiquities.'⁶ It was in the following year that his earliest historical work, A Summary of English Chronicles, first appeared. In that edition, as in the subsequent one of 1566, he was content to depend chiefly on such simple sources as the Chronicles of Hardyng, Fabyan, and Hall, though for

¹ Annales, p. 352; Cal. Pat. Rolls, Henry V, ii. 84, 141; cf. Dict. Nat. Biog. xxvii. 259.

² See Survey of London, i-xxii.

³ Id. ii. 128, 381.

⁴ See pp. 92-4, 150, 166, and 174 above.

⁵ In the Introduction to the Survey of London, i, pp. xcii, xciii, I gave a list of over twenty ancient manuscripts which belonged to or were used by Stow; it might be much extended, see pp. 23, 71, 104, 148, 150, and 154 above.

⁶ Survey of London, i, pp. xlix, lxxxi.

the first of these he followed not the printed text of Grafton, but the early version of Lansdowne MS. 204.¹ The much enlarged editions of 1570 and 1575 were the output of his own researches; in the former, for instance, the 'Translator of Livius' first appears as the source for Stow's history of the reign of Henry V.² The process was carried still further in the Chronicles of England, which was published in 1580. The form of an annalistic City Chronicle, which Stow thus far retained, was abandoned when his history appeared in an enlarged form as the Annales of England in 1592. Though he now dropped the division by mayoral years with its inconvenient chronology,³ he still arranged his material by regnal years⁴, and preserved as closely as possible the actual sequence of events. This does not seem to represent Stow's own conception of the best form for a history. He explains in his dedication that he had ready a large volume 'which I was willing to have committed to the press, had not the printer, for some private respects, been more desirous to publish Annales at this present'.⁵ At a later time he lamented that the publication of his larger work, which he seems to have styled 'The History of this Island', had been 'prevented by printing and reprinting of Reyne Wolfe's collections, and other late comers by the name of Ralf Holinshead's Chronicles'.⁶ All trace of it seems now to have perished, but in justice to Stow's literary reputation it must be recorded that we do not possess his historical work in its most finished form. The third edition of the Annales appeared in 1605 just before the author's death. In the later editions of 1615 and 1631 Edmund Howes made some alteration of the text for the sixteenth century, but so far as I am aware left that for our period untouched.

Stow's Annales make little pretence to literary form, but

¹ See pp. 144, 148 above.

² Amongst other authorities he now also quotes Walsingham, Hoccleve, and John Rous.

³ In the later editions of the Summary, and Summary Abridged, it was still retained.

⁴ As Hall also had done. Stow only puts the regnal year in the margin; Hall divided the text.

⁵ See Survey of London, i, p. lxxix.

⁶ Annales, ed. 1605, p. 1438; Summarie for 1604, p. 458.

are singularly free from prejudice and justify always his own maxim: 'In histories the chief thing that is to be desired is truth.' If he found a narrative suitable to his purpose, he was content to follow it closely. If it was necessary to construct one for himself, he did so faithfully, putting together his material without much art or alteration. So his work is unequal in value, but is most helpful to us where he had least help from others and was most dependent on original research.

For the reign of Henry IV Stow found his main framework in the Historia Anglicana of Walsingham. For that of Henry V he followed for the most part the 'Translator of Livius', whose paraphrasing of his originals, even when at fault, Stow reproduces with great fidelity. As I pointed out in the third chapter, Stow thus preserved for us much tradition which has impressed itself on our later histories. But he supplemented the accounts of Walsingham and the 'Translator' from numerous other sources. For the reign of Henry IV he quotes Records at the Tower, John Gower, Hoccleve, the Histoire du duc Louis d'Orléans, and Otterbourne. Under Henry V, besides Walsingham and Otterbourne, he quotes the Liber Metricus of Thomas Elmham, and the Pseudo-Elmham (under the name of Roger Wall¹), as well as some minor authorities. Likewise he made much use of London Chronicles, including matter the source of which could till quite recently only be guessed at.²

The history of the earlier part of the reign of Henry VI is similar in character. Stow depends largely on commonplace authorities like Robert Gaguin, Fabyan, and Hall, but supplements them from other sources, such as the Chronicles of London and the St. Albans Annals.³ The quotation of local records⁴ makes his work still occasionally useful.

For the last ten years of Henry VI Stow's history is of a different quality, and the insertion of numerous documents, which would otherwise be lost, entitles this part of his work to take rank as an original authority of importance. Of particular value are a series of documents relating to Jack

¹ See p. 62 above.

³ See p. 151 above.

² See pp. 92, 93, 106, 107 above.

⁴ Cf. Annales, pp. 385, 386, 388.

Cade's rebellion.¹ Others are letters and proclamations by Richard of York and his supporters between 1450 and 1460.² Some of these Stow took from Davies's Chronicle,³ whence he also derived his valuable narrative of Bishop Pecock's downfall⁴; some are to be found elsewhere; but others are known only through Stow's Annales, and his transcripts in Lambeth MS. 306, and Harley MSS. 543 and 545; Harley 543 contains much material collected by him for the history of the fifteenth century, which is still unprinted.⁵

Stow's history of the reign of Edward IV was made peculiarly valuable by the continued use of material of his own collection,⁶ and in particular of the Arrival of King Edward IV, the English version of which is preserved only through his transcript.⁷ There is also some material taken from 'Fabian's MS.' (The Great Chronicle of London), for which up to this present we have been dependent on the Annales alone. With Warkworth's Chronicle Stow had a second-hand acquaintance through the collections of Leland. He had also made use of the Mémoires of Philippe de Comines.

For the reigns of Edward V and Richard III Stow copies Sir Thomas More without any concealment, using Rastell's edition but inserting some of Grafton's additions. When More fails him he depends chiefly on Hall, supplemented occasionally from 'Records in the Tower' and John Rous. He may also have added a little from tradition; George Buck relates that Stow had told him how he had talked with old men who remembered Richard III as a comely prince.⁸

Stow is conspicuous above all his predecessors for the care with which he commonly gives his authorities in the margin; his recognition of this part of an historian's duties marks

¹ Annales, pp. 388-9, 391-2.

² Id. pp. 394-6 (misplaced under 1452; these documents belong to 1450), 405-6, 409-12.

³ See p. 129 above.

⁴ Annales, pp. 402-3.

⁵ See further, pp. 368-9 below. Apparently Stow derived his copies from Yelverton MS. 35; see Fortescue, Governance of England, p. 89, ed. Plummer. Some of the documents not included in the Annales are printed in Chronicles of the White Rose, pp. lxxiv-vi, Three Fifteenth Century Chronicles, pp. 94-9, and Ellis, Original Letters.

⁶ See p. 369 below.

⁷ See p. 174 above.

⁸ Kennet, Complete History, i. 548.

a great advance. Unfortunately he does not do so invariably, and the references which he gives are often vague. It is therefore not always easy to trace his material to its source. Sometimes no doubt he quotes second-hand, as when in his history of Henry V he cites Tito Livio and Monstrelet through the English 'Translator'. Still, the accuracy with which he reproduces the 'Translator's' errors is itself proof of the trust which may be placed in Stow as a faithful copier. In his own words, he was content as 'some simple feaster . . . to be friended of his neighbours, and to set before them such dishes as he had gotten of others'.¹ He made no claim to literary distinction, though he shows in places that he had a capacity for vivid narrative.² But apart from the question of form his Annales was the best history of England which had appeared up to his death. Whatever other criticism may be passed on him, our debt for the material which he has preserved in his printed works, and in his manuscript Collections, cannot be too highly estimated.

The Chronicles of Raphael Holinshed are of a different character. Stow's Annales were the fruit of one man's life-long labours. Holinshed's Chronicles after a modern fashion were the work of a syndicate. Reyne Wolfe, the printer, had designed a 'Universal History', on which Holinshed worked. After Wolfe's death in 1573 other printers took up the plan on the more modest scale of Histories of England, Scotland, and Ireland. With the help of William Harrison and others the Chronicles at length appeared under Holinshed's name in 1578. Holinshed died in 1580, and not long afterwards another enlarged edition was projected under the superintendence of John Hooker, who was assisted by Francis Thynne and Abraham Fleming, and in the latter portions by John Stow. This second edition was published in 1587, seven years after Stow's Chronicles of England, and five years before the first edition of the Annales. In point of time Holinshed's Chronicles were therefore the first complete history of England of an authoritative character, composed in English and in a continuous narrative, to appear in print ; though on the mere score of originality a better claim might perhaps be alleged on behalf of Stow.

¹ Survey of London, i, pp. lxxv, lxxvi.

² Though not so conspicuously as he does in the Survey.

Stow, at least in his later works, seems rather to have avoided the use of recent histories, and may be said to have depended chiefly on his own research in original sources. Holinshed and his collaborators, on the other hand, borrowed freely from Hall and from Stow himself, adopting often their precise words. The works of Hall and Stow were at all events of acknowledged authority; but the constant quotations from a mere school-book like the *Anglorum Praelia*¹ of Christopher Ocland does not impress the reader with a high sense of the literary discrimination of Abraham Fleming, who seems to have been responsible for their insertion. Nevertheless, Holinshed and his editors were not mere plagiarists. They had themselves made researches in original sources, and not infrequently reproduced material which Stow had missed, though they preserved less which was not easily to be found elsewhere. Since, however, Holinshed's Chronicles followed so closely second-hand authorities, there would be no purpose in recapitulating the original sources, which are as a rule given in the margin. It will be enough to indicate briefly the principal additions² to the sources used by Hall and Stow. Under Henry V Tito Livio's Vita was consulted in the Latin original; but the 'Translator' was also quoted, both through Stow and directly for some things which Stow had omitted.³ The Pseudo-Elmhams was used more fully than by Stow. A series of documents relating to the exploits of John Bromley, an ancestor of Sir Thomas Bromley, 'the Chancellor that now is', supply a little new matter of interest.⁴ The better use made of Monstrelet and of other French writers,⁵

¹ It first appeared in 1580. It is written in hexameter verse, 'in a tame strain, not exceedingly bad, but still farther from good.' Hallam, Literature of Europe, ii. 248.

² The use made of Hall and Stow is generally acknowledged. The latter is quoted both from his 'diligent collected Summary' and from his 'quarto Chronicles'.

³ See pp. 66, 67 above.

⁴ Chronicles, iii. 75-6, 97-9, 100-1; these passages are marked W. P., as supplied by William Patten, who was also responsible for some other additions.

⁵ e.g. Jehan de Tillet, Les Chroniques de Bretagne, Le Rosier, and La Vie de Charles VII; cf. Chronicles, iii. 163-70.

as well as of the Chronicles of Flanders, and of Normandy published by Denis Sauvage, render the history of the French war superior to that given by Stow. Similarly the free following of Hall improves the earlier history of the reign of Henry VI. The most valuable part of the narrative for the ten years from 1450 to 1460 is taken avowedly from Stow, but is supplemented from other sources; much use is made of Whethamstede, with whose Register the writer of this part of Holinshed's Chronicles had clearly independent acquaintance.¹ Much was also borrowed from Hall, whose prejudiced interpretation was grafted on to the more impartial narrative of Stow.² It is, however, fair to note that when Holinshed quotes the speech which Hall puts into the mouth of Richard of York, in November 1460, he observes that John Whethamstede 'who by all likelihood was there present, maketh no further recital of anie words, which the duke should utter'.³ For the reign of Edward IV Holinshed cites Fabyan, Hall, Stow, and The Arrivall (under the name of Fleetwood); the last is here garbled in the Lancastrian interest. The history of the reigns of Edward V and Richard III is based on the works of More and Hall almost exactly as in Stow, but with some slight interpolations. Hooker, who was an Exeter man, inserted throughout the Chronicles some notes of west-country history; one which relates to Richard III,⁴ is of interest as the original of Shakespeare's lines⁵:

When last I was at Exeter,
The Mayor in courtesy show'd me the Castle,
And call'd it Rougemont: at which name I started,
Because a bard of Ireland told me once
I should not live long after I saw Richmond.

This is a good instance in proof of the fact that it was on Holinshed's Chronicles that Shakespeare depended for the material of his historical plays; it illustrates also how the ¹ Cf. Stow, Annales, 393, and Holinshed, iii. 230.

² Stow (Annales, 390) says 'the King sent Sir Humphrey Stafford . . . to follow the Kentish men'; Holinshed (iii. 224), whilst following Stow for his main narrative, adopts from Hall (Chronicle, p. 220) the words 'The queen (that bare rule) . . . sent,' &c.

³ Chronicles, iii. 262.

⁴ Id. iii. 421.

⁵ Richard III., Act iv, Sc. ii.

dramatist adopted often not only his facts but even some of his phrases from that source.

It is perhaps more due to the service which he rendered to Shakespeare than to any merit of his own that Holinshed has long overshadowed Hall and Stow as an historian of the fifteenth century. He excelled Hall in the extent of his researches, and Stow in the literary form which he gave to them. But to one or the other of his two great predecessors he was indebted for much of his best material. Thus, though his Chronicles were a meritorious compilation, which in default of printed originals were long of much historical value, their greatest interest now consists in their literary associations. Holinshed copied Hall's prejudices rather than Stow's impartiality, and the colour which he thus gave to his narrative reappears naturally in Shakespeare's plays, and has in consequence been stamped on popular opinion.

It is somewhat remarkable that whilst the sixteenth-century distortions of fifteenth-century history should have so long passed current, the underlying perception of its unity and importance should have been so often overlooked. That Hall grasped the truth is shown in the title which he gave to his Chronicle. It appears also in the continuous cycle of Shakespeare's histories. The downfall of Richard II, the glories of Henry V, the long struggle of Lancaster and York ending in the happy union of the rival houses, were all stages in the preparation for a greater Age. The artless efforts of fifteenth-century writers paved also the way for greater achievements. We may feel a just pride in realizing that so much of the rude material from which Shakespeare was to construct his chief historical plays was fashioned originally in our native English speech.

APPENDIX

I. A SOUTHERN CHRONICLE

1399—1422

This piece is the conclusion of a brief Chronicle from the earliest times to 1422, which is contained in Additional MS. 11714 at the British Museum. The whole work occupies only thirteen leaves, the part which is here printed beginning on f. 12^{vo}. It is followed on ff. 14, 15 by some short chronological annals, which end: 'Anno Domini Mccccxii^o. Coronacio Henrici v^{ti}, qui regni sui anno x^o in francia obiit, apud Westmonasterium sepelitur.' The date of composition cannot have been earlier than 1423, and was perhaps not later than 1426; since the concluding paragraph, which refers to the Parliament of Nov. 1422, does not describe Henry Beaufort as Cardinal, and was apparently written whilst Thomas Beaufort was alive. The handwriting belongs to the second quarter of the fifteenth century. As described on pp. 29-31 above the interest of this piece consists in the evidence which it furnishes for the origin of the earlier part of the Continuation of the Eulogium Historiarum. The latter work was not compiled till after 1428, so that this Chronicle is possibly an older though abbreviated representative of the original. For this theory there is some confirmation in the omission of the reference to the exhumation of Wiclif, and in the presence in the earlier part (before 1399) of some small details not found in the Continuation. Of the conclusion of the Chronicle enough has been said on pp. 31, 32 above.

Henricus iste quartus coronatus continuauit Parliamentum apud Westmonasterium, in quo assistentes regi Ricardo examinauit, set¹ de pernicioso consilio nullus tunc conuinci potuit; prohibuitque rex cum parlamento² ne sine responcione aliquis dampnaretur in perpetuum. Parliamentum ultimum regis Ricardi iudicia in illo facta et ordinationes irritauit.³ Filium comitis Arundel comitem Arundel fecit; comitem Warr.,⁴ et dominum de Cobenham de exilio reuocauit. Cartas omnes, quas a regno sigillari exegerat, London. patenter comburi fecit. Primogenitum suum⁵ principem Wallie statuit,⁶ et omnes duces ordinatos per regem Ricardum⁷ in ultimo parlamento deordinauit. Rogerum Walden omnia, que receperat de episcopatu Cantuar., Thome Arundel restituere coegit, et de episcopatu extulit, vitam sibi concedendo⁸; Bonefacius papa iudicium Ricardi contra Thomam Arundel

¹ si E. (= Eulogium).

² parlamento in perpetuum E.

³ iudicia sua et ordinationes factas ibidem irritauit et iuramenta atque excommunicationes non observantium evanuerunt. E.

⁴ Warr. de carcere E.

⁵ suum Henricum E.

⁶ fecit E.

⁷ a rege Ricardo E.

⁸ et ad preces eiusdem Thome vitam concessit E.

Prima insurrexio contra Henricum
quartum.

cassum fuisse declarauit, et quod ecclesia Cantuariensis propter hoc non vacauit, quamuis ipse ipsam ecclesiam Rogero dederit.¹ Rex nathale tenuit apud Wyndsor. Interim Iohannes Holand, germanus regis Ricardi ex parte matris, comes de Bokyngham,² Comes Cancie, et Comes Sarum collecta comitia in insidiis latuerunt, ut regem ibidem caperent et archiepiscopum ad regem venientem. Set hoc regi intimato, rex archiepiscopum premuniuit, et statim deuians de via recta London. adiuit, et archiepiscopus ad castrum de Reygate. Comes Cancie et Sarum frustrati proposito ad villam de Circetre cum comitia sua illo die equitabant. Comes de Huntyngdon se transformans sumpto secum auro et vno solo comite fugit in Essexiam querens extra regnum nauigare, set captus a populo decollatus est,³ comitissa Herfordie ibidem habitante et omnino id volente. Comites autem Sarum et Cancie a villanis de Circetre capti et interfecti sunt; ceteros vero qui cum eis venerant ligantes regi Oxon. duxerunt, ubi multi nobiles interfecti sunt, quorum numerus ad 26 se extendit, ut dicitur. Fuerunt eciam interfecti eo tempore London. milites et eciam nobiles ecclesiastici, quorum vnus vocabatur magister Willelmus Ferby, decanus maioris ecclesie Ebor., et alius magnus rector qui fuerat capellanus regis Ricardi. Ricardus, olim rex, in carcere hoc audiens cepit de auxilio desperare, qui ibidem pro tristitia mortuus est. Quidam dicebant per famem periit. Eodem eciam tempore dominus comes Wynchestr.,⁴ dominus scilicet de dispensariis, a communitate Bristoll. interfectus est. Hoc anno Scoti treugas violantes multa mala in partibus borialibus fecerunt, quare rex Henricus congregato exercitu Scociam adiuit, set deficientibus victualibus in Angliam rediit.

2^o anno rex tenuit parlamentum London., ubi decima cleri et quintadecima laicorum concessa est. Hoc anno Walenses duce armigero Johanne Glendore rebellare ceperunt ad magnum dampnum regni. Eodem eciam anno in parlamento predicto London. archiepiscopus Cantuar. vnum sacerdotem secularem propter heresim Wiclif circa sacramentum eukaristie degradauit, et manu seculari tradidit, qui ibidem combustus est. Quare alii diuersi illius secte hereses suas in cruce sancti Pauli publice reuocabant.⁵

Anno 3^o Walenses in partibus occidentalibus multa mala fecerunt; dominum . n . de Greyrithyn ceperunt et ad redempcionem 12 milium

¹ quod ecclesia non vacavit nec pastore destituta fuit E.

² An error for Huntyngdon. E. is here much fuller.

³ se transformans in simplicem per patrie illius communitatem captus et usque Plasshe adductus decollatur E. The Eulogium now differs so much that a collation is useless; it does not contain the next two sentences at all.

⁴ An error for Gloucestr.

⁵ At this point the resemblance to the Eulogium ceases.

coegerunt, multis suorum interfectis. Eodem etiam anno Walenses dominum Edmundum de mortuo mari, comitis Marchie fratrem, ceperunt, et interfectis multis viris valentibus parciū occidentalium. Vnde numerus occisorum ad duo milia se extendit, ut dicebatur. Toto tempore istius Henrici quarti Walenses rebelles regno fuerunt, nec eos domare potuit, et tamen diuersis vicibus Walliam cum exercitu intrauit. Contra istum Henricum insurrexit dominus Henricus Percy, ^{1^a insurrexio contra eundem.} filius comitis Northumbrie, et habuit cum eo bellum durissimum prope Salopiam. In quo bello predictus Henricus Percy interfectus est cum multis milibus valenciū et vulgi ex utraque parte. Victoria tamen cessit regi. Postea comes Northumbrie, pater predicti Henrici, fugit in Scociam, et cum eo dominus de Bardolf, qui post duos annos intrauerunt partes boriales Anglie sperantes auxilium a valentibus patrie, set frustrati spe per ipsos de parte boriali interfecti sunt. Post istos contra istum Henricum ^{2^a insurrexio contra prefatum.} 4^m insurrexerunt episcopus Eboracensis et comes Marescallie, et multi valentes cum eis; tandem per tractatum pacis capti archiepiscopus et comes ambo decollati sunt. Archiepiscopus vero secundum famam vulgi maximis miraculis coruscat.

Iste Henricus 4^{tu}s, non obstante quod taxas et tallagia omni tempore regni sui exegit a communitate, tamen semper amantissimus communitati fuit. Fuit etiam multum liberalis erga extraneos; in se vero multum probus; et in iuuentute sua rebus militaribus multum exercitatus; in ecclesiasticos in principio regni sui multum austerus, tandem in fine penitens satis fuit eis beniuolens. In fine quoque vite sue infirmitate lepre grauissime percussus grauissima morte vitam finiuit xiiij^o anno regni sui, et Cantuarie in ecclesia sancte trinitatis sepelitur.

Henricus quintus apud Westmonasterium post mortem patris Mcccix¹ coronatus, repente mutatus est in virum alterum.² Nam contra multorum spem insolencias et lasciuias iuuentutis deferens totum se milicie et probitati, sapientie et bonitati dedit. Vnde in 3^o anno regni sui secundo intrauit Normanniam, villam de Harflu obsedit et infra duos menses cepit. Deinde per terram veniens Calesiam vix cum vij milibus virorum, et obuiauit apud Agyncoort cum dolphino Francie habente secum in exercitu plus quam 80 milia virorum, et bellum commissum est inter eos; victoria tamen, deo adiuuante, regi Anglie cessit. In quo bello ex parte francorum interfecti sunt dolphinus et dux Brabancie, et multi alii nobiles cum uulgi maxima multitudine. Capti vero ex parte francorum fuerunt dux Aurelianensium, dux Burbundie, Dominus Bursigaunt, et alii multi valentes. Ex parte vero anglorum vix fuerunt interfecti ix viri, inter quos fuerunt interfecti dux Eboracensis et comes Suthfolch. Tandem rex gloriose venit Calesiam, et deinde intrauit Angliam. Cui in pascha proximo sequenti venit imperator Almannie volens reformare pacem inter regna. Quem rex recepit London. cum summo honore, et omnes expensas sibi et suis dum infra regnum erant habundantissime ministravit. Tandem gallicis pacta pacis semper mutantibus vel infringentibus, Imperator ipse proposito fraudatus discessit, nullum defectum quantum ad pacis reformationem, ut publice professus est, in anglicis reperiens. Qua propter rex Anglie proximo anno sequenti intrauit iterum Normanniam, omnes ciuitates, villas et castra strenuissime sibi acquirens. Quo facto ciuitas Parisiensis fame et inedia ac terrore compulsum se per tractatum pacis regi Anglie reddidit. Quibus peractis rex Anglie per assensum regine Francie et ducis Burgundie filiam regis francorum acceptus in vxorem, ex qua suscepit filium Henricum vj. Et quia rex francorum a multis annis fuerat lunaticus, et iam non erat capax rationis, conuentum est inter anglicos et francos quod rex francorum teneret nomen regis et portaret coronam ad terminum vite sue; rex vero Anglie vocaretur regens Francie et heres post decessum regis francorum. Iste Henricus rex iterum intrauit in Angliam relinquens ducem exercitus fratrem suum dominum Thomam, ducem Clarencie, qui dux a scotis cum multis aliis interfectus fuit. Rex vero, hoc audiens, citius quo potuit iterum rediit in Franciam, et ultra Normanniam multas villas muratas et castra fortissima conquisiuit. Iste rex Henricus renouans totam monetam auream Anglie, que per tonsores et lotores¹ tantum erat peiorata quod vnum nobile vix valuit v solidos, ordinauit sub pena deperditionis, quod nullus reciperet vel solueret aliquod aurum nisi haberet plenum pondus secundum statutum regni. Tandem infirmitate grauissima anno regni sui x in Francia mortuus est; apud Westmonasterium sepelitur.

¹ This date seems to be a mere accidental error; cf. p. 275 above.

² mox ut initiatus est regni insulis, repente mutatus est in virum alterum, Walsingham, Hist. Angl. ii. 290.

³ et, MS.

Hic reliquit filium nondum vnus anni, et ideo ipse posuit regimen regni usque ad annos discrecionis pueri in manibus fratrum suorum, videlicet domini Iohannis, ducis Bedefordie, et domini Vmfridi, ducis Glouernie, et dominorum auunculorum suorum, ducis Exonie et episcopi Wynton. Qui quatuor de assensu parlamenti ordinauerunt ducem Bedefordie custodem Normannie, et ducem Glouernie custodem Anglie.

¹ Anglice 'clippers and washers'; cf. Gregory's Chronicle, p. 142.

II. A NORTHERN CHRONICLE

1399—1430

This Chronicle occurs as a continuation of Higden's Polychronicon in Harley MS. 3600, ff. 233-7, and in Cotton. MS. Domitian A xii ff. 131-38. In the latter it is headed in a later hand 'Cronica de Kirstall'; but, as the editors of the *Monasticon*¹ rightly observe, it is a Chronicle of a general kind and has nothing to do with Kirkstall Abbey; possibly this manuscript may have belonged to that house.

The Harley MS. formerly belonged to Whalley Abbey; on f. 240^{vo} is the note 'Liber Monasterii beate Marie de Whalley per procuracionem'; and on f. 3* 'Anno domini M^occcc^o septuagesimo quarto intrauerunt Fratres Jacobus Dugdall, Willelmus Forest, Henricus Salley, Johannes Seller, Johannes Grinhyltone, Johannes Forster, in Cellam Nouiciorum in die apostolorum Philippi et Jacobi. At ab b littera dominicalis apud Whalley. Quorum animis (sic) per misericordiam Jhu Christi in pace requiescant.' On f. 241^{vo} 'Johes Wakfelde' is twice written. In the seventeenth century it seems to have belonged to one W. Petyt. Both Kirkstall and Whalley were Cistercian houses, and the Chronicle may have been the work of a monk of that order. In any case the northern origin of the Chronicle is manifest. The earliest part of the Harley MS., to the middle of Book II, is in a fourteenth century hand: the remainder is in a hand of the middle of the fifteenth century. The Chronicle in the Cotton. MS. is in the same hand throughout.

For a criticism of the contents see pp. 35, 36 above.

In the footnotes to the text the Harley MS.=H., and the Cotton MS.=K.

Postquam² prefatus rex Ricardus regnasset xxij. annis et tribus mensibus supradictus Henricus, Dux Herfordie et Lancastrie, consensu Ricardi, nuper Regis, et omnium procerum tocius regni vnctus est in regem apud Westmon. a domino Thoma, Cant. archiepiscopo, in festo sancti Edwardi confessoris.³

Eodem anno⁴ circa festum natalis domini dominus Johannes Holande, dux Excestrie, dux de Surry, comes de Sarum, dominus de Spenser, comes Gloucestrie set non dux, et dominus Radulphus Lumley, prepotentes milites, et alii quamplures consurrexerunt aduersus dominum regem; quod illum minime latuit; set fauente deo sine

¹ Monasticon Anglicanum, v. 326. The Domitian copy begins with Brutus, and is apparently an abbreviated version of the Polychronicon.

² Anno igitur domini millesimo ccc^o. nonagesimo nono in festo sancti Edwardi confessoris postquam K.

³ 13th Oct.; in festo . . . confessoris om. K.

⁴ Ricardus autem quondam rex translatus est de turri London. vsque ad castrum de Pontfrett, vbi diu ante mortem pane et aqua, vt dicebatur, sustentatus. tandem fame necatus est secundum communem famam et sepultus apud Langley. Anno primo Henrici regis K.

multi sanguinis effusione predictos duces et comites, proceres, et vulgares in diuersis locis capti sunt et decollati, ac capita eorum allata sunt regi.

In estate vero sequente dominus rex Henricus, congregatis proceribus regni et exercitu copioso, perrexit in Scociam vsque Edynburgh, vbi xxij. diebus ibi permansit, et quod¹ nullam resistenciam inuenit fecit quicquid voluit²; set auditis rumoribus de Wallencibus rebellionibus redire compulsus est.³

Nam hiis temporibus⁴ quidam nomine Owenus de Glendore de Wallia consurrexit aduersus regem et regnum Anglie. Hic cum Britonibus et Wallicis sibi fauentibus fuit guerram contra regnum Anglie per totam vitam regis Henrici. Primo vero deuicit et cepit dominum le Gray de Rethyn, et multos cum illo occidit, ipsum custodiens quasi per annum; tandem data sibi magna redemptione auri illum liberum dimisit.

Post hoc pugnavit cum domino Edmundo Mortimer, et illum vicit et cepit, ac filiam suam desponsare coegit, ex qua liberos procreauit.

Deinde quot Anglos per vices occidit, quot villas cremauit, et quot castella cepit et circumuenit,⁵ non est facile enarrare; xvj. enim castella et ultra in vno anno, vt dicebatur, diruit et fundo concoequauit.

Contra quem Rex sepius⁶ collecto exercitu debellare cogitabat. Set predictus Owenus armiger, regis exercitum expectare non audens, de loco ad locum fugiens, semper aut in preruptis montibus aut in siluis latebrosis latitabat. Propterea Rex⁷ ordinauit principem⁸ filium suum et alios diuersos dominos cum apparatu sufficienti, qui omnes ciuitates muratas et castella circa Marchiam Wallie bene et fideliter custodirent, et predictum Owenum cum suis Wallicis continue repellendo expugnarent.

Circa festum exaltacionis sancte crucis⁹ factum est bellum de Homildon inter Anglos et Scotos,¹⁰ vbi Angli victores extiterunt. In quo bello ex parte Anglie capitalis dominus fuit Henricus de Percy, comes Northumbrie et constabularius Anglie, et¹¹ dominus Henricus Percy, filius et heres prefati comitis. Captique sunt ex parte Scotorum Morduc le fif, filius et heres ducis Albanie, item comes Dowglas; et multi alii proceres et magnates, et alii¹² vulgares, quorum numerus ignoratur, sunt occisi.

¹ vsque ad Edynburgh, vbi, sicut in multis aliis locis, quod K.

² fecit suum beneplacitum K. ³ set . . . compulsus est om. K.

⁴ Circa hec tempora K. ⁵ cepit et destruxit K.

⁶ Dominus Rex pluribus vicibus K. ⁷ prefatus dominus Rex K.

⁸ dominum principem K. ⁹ Circa annum regis Henrici tercium K.

¹⁰ Scotos, circa festum exaltacionis sancte crucis K.

¹¹ ac etiam K ¹² multi alii K.

Hoc anno quidam iniqui et maledicti seminauerunt discordias 1403: 4 inter dominum Regem et prefatum comitem Northumbrie cum filio suo. Propter quod circa festum translacionis sancti Thome¹ in estate dominus Henricus de Percy quasi cum ducentis hominibus transiuit de Northumbria per comitatum Lancastrie vsque ad Cestriam, vbi conuenerunt ad eundem omnes quasi procures et magnates cum populo de comitatu Cestr., de comitatu de Flynt, et de Bromfeld et *Yale*²; et factus est exercitus grandis et fortis; perrexeruntque per limites Marchie et³ Wallie vsque ad Shrewesbury. Comes vero Northumbrie, pater illius, parabat exercitum in partibus borealibus vt filio suo subueniret. Pluresque alii comites et procures regni, vt dicebatur, promiserunt auxilium. Set superueniente comite Westmerlandie, marescallo Anglie, cum multitudine copiosa, comes Northumbrie versus Northumbriam redire cogeatur, et dispersus est populus ab illo.

Set Rex Henricus, audito quod consurrexerunt⁴ aduersus eum, reliquit London et venit vsque Derby, Tutbury, et Burton-super-Trent; et ex omni parte regni conuenerunt ad Regem; vnde collecto copioso exercitu perrexit versus villam de Shrewesbury, vbi predictus dominus Henricus tunc tempore erat.

Preparato igitur exercitu ex vtraque parte Rex cum proceribus regni, et predictus Henricus de Percy cum domino Thoma de Percy comite Wygornie, auunculo suo, et aliis quam plurimis proceribus, baronibus et militibus conuenerunt in campum quendam vocatum Bullfeld; et congressi sunt ab hora tertia vsque ad vespervas; occisique sunt ex vtraque parte procures ac multi nobiles, et vulgus quasi innumerabile. Inter quos, heu proth dolor, cecidit inclitus et nobilis dominus Henricus de Percy ex parte sua, et ex parte Regis Comes Staffordie. Comesque Wigornie, Thomas de Percy, et Comes Dowglas capti sunt. Occisique ex vtraque parte quasi tribus millibus, ceteri fugerunt, et Rex Henricus potitus est victoria. Sepultique sunt in eodem campo in vno sepulcro mille et quingenta corpora occisorum; vbi nunc predictum sepulcrum est cimiterium cuiusdam collegii, quod ibidem constructum est; vbi plures sacerdotes modo habitant, continue celebrantes pro animabus occisorum.

Die autem sequente Rex decollari fecit comitem Wigornie apud Salopiam; et prefatum Henricum de Percy, postquam sepultus fuerat apud Whittchirche, Rex fecit extrahi de sepulcro, et quatuor corporis sui quarteria misit ad diuersa loca, et capud eius fecit suspendi super portam borealem apud Ebor.

¹ 7th July.² Yale, in Denbigh.³ et om. *K.*⁴ consurrexissent K.

Post hoc Rex venit ad Pontemfractum, vbi comes Northumbrie venit ad eum, quasi pro gracia impetranda. Set precepto regio captus est et detentus ac deductus vsque ad quoddam castellum¹ domini Willelmi Bagott, militis, iuxta Couentr., vbi permansit vsque ad quadragesimam sequentem, et tunc perductus est ad parlamentum, in quo iudicio parium et procerum regni inuentus est fidelis de prodicione, et sic solutus abire permittitur. Divertitque cito in partes boreales, et copulauit filiam domini Henrici filii sui domino Johanni Clifford, domino de Westmerland.

Ante ista tempora dominus Rex desponsauit ducissam Britannie minoris, filiam regis Nauerr., de qua, vt dicebatur, genuit duos abortiuos.

1404: 5

Hoc anno Magister Ricardus le Scrope, Archiepiscopus Ebor., Comes Marescallus, dominus Willelmus Plumpton, miles, et plures alii de patria, cum ciuibus Ebor., consurrexerunt aduersus Regem. Set Comes Westmerlandie, dominus Johannes filius Regis, dominus Fitzhewe cum exercitu occurrerunt illis iuxta Ebor., et facto subdolo tractatu et promissione ceperunt predictum Archiepiscopum, comitem Marescallum, dominum Willelmum Plumpton et plures alios. Populusque, qui cum illis erat, diffugit ab eis; et perduxerunt Archiepiscopum et Comitem ad Regem apud Pontemfractum, et posuerunt eos in custodia.

Postea dominus Rex transiit ad Ebor., vbi populus ciuitatis, toto corpore nudatus exceptis femoralibus, prostratus coram Rege misericordiam precabatur, et tandem optinuit.

Deinde Rex iuit ad manerium de Bisshophthorpe² iuxta Ebor., vbi in festo sancti Willelmi³ archiepiscopi Ebor., data sententia, Archiepiscopus, Comes, et miles decollati sunt; capitaque comitis et militis posita sunt super portas ciuitatis. Set Archiepiscopus cum suo capite sepultus est in ecclesia beati Petri Ebor., in parte boreali ecclesie iuxta magnum altare. Vbi postmodum infinita miracula choruscant, et quasi cotidie de nouo choruscant. Nam simulacra et similitudines miraculorum cum cedulis monstrantibus infirmitates et loca personarum testantur satis clare, quod ibidem propter merita Archiepiscopi dominus plura miracula ostendere dignatus est.

Insuper dominus Henricus Rex nocte sequente post⁴ decollacionem Archiepiscopi percussus est lepra insanabili, que ipsum circa nouem annos sequentes continue et cotidie cruciabat, illum finaliter extinguendo.

Rex tum profectus est ad villam de Ripon⁵ et sic in Northumbriam, et cepit castella comitis Northumbrie, viz. Prudhawe et Werke-worthe.

¹ Baginton.² Bischothorpe K.³ 8th June.⁴ post om. H.⁵ Henry was at Ripon 9th-16th June; Wylie, Henry IV, iv. 294.

Deinde perrexit ad Berwicum, vbi, capto tandem castello et villa, decollari fecit dominum Willelmum de Graystok cum aliis pluribus proceribus et generosis sibi resistentibus.

Nam comes Northumbrie, quem Rex tunc persequabatur, cum Henrico de Percy filio filii sui propter metum aufugit in Scociam.

Rex vero, postquam desiderium voluntatis sue in partibus borealibus perfecte complevisset, partes australes adiit.

Set antequam Rex partes australes adiret dominus Willelmus de Clifford et dominus Henricus de Percy¹ reddiderunt domino Regi castellum de Alnewik, quod Rex cum guerra seu obsidione capere nequiuisset, vt dicebatur.

Interim dominus Rex Henricus exaltauit dominum Thomam, filium suum, in Senescallum Anglie, et dominum Johannem, filium suum, in Constabularium Anglie.

Comes vero Northumbrie, qui prius constabularius erat, quasi per annum moram traxit in Scocia cum duce Albanie, cum quo pacto inito cum iuramenti securitate reliquit cum illo predictum Henricum heredem suum, et perrexit in Walliam pro auxilio habendo; set non inueniens ibi tutum refugium nauigauit in Franciam, vbi diu transiuit de loco ad locum et de proceribus ad proceres pro refugio optinendo; set parum vel nullum consilium vel solamen optinere potuit.

Tandem² vero reuersus est in Scociam ad ducem Albanie, vbi aliquantulum commoratus est. Cito post hoc³ intrauit in Angliam, et peruenit ad villam de Ripon, vbi et in illuc veniendo conuenerunt ad eum quasi octingenti viri. Inde diuertit ad villam de Tadcastr.⁴ Set dominus Thomas de Rokeby, vicecomes Ebor., collecta multitudine copiosa plebis, congressus est cum prefato comite supra moram de Bramham, vbi tandem predictus comes occisus est, et dominus de Bardolfe captus est semimortuus, et multi ex vtraque parte occisi sunt, et alii ex parte comitis fugerunt seu capti sunt.

Deinde vicecomes Ebor. cepit corpus comitis et dominum de Bardolfe, qui cito infra quatuor milliaria exspirauit pro dolore vehementi, et duxit corpora illorum ad castrum Ebor.; vbi ex precepto regis corpora eorum per quarteria diuisa sunt, et ad diuersas ciuitates transmissa vt suspenderentur in introitibus portarum; et eorum capita similiter suspensa sunt.

¹ Sir Henry Percy of Athol, son of Thomas Percy (d. 1381) and grandson of Northumberland.

² In 1407.

³ A^o domini M.ccccvij^o K.; in Feb. 1407-8.

⁴ On 19th Feb.

1412: 14 Circa hec tempora Henricus Rex dedit terras et dominia comitis Northumbrie domino Johanni, filio suo tercio genito. Anno domini Mccccxij^o et Henrici Regis anno xiiij^o completo et quasi v. mensibus ultra, idem Rex, ingrauescente morbo, quo a morte archiepiscopi predicti vexatus fuerat, multipliciter et illum de die in diem adnichilante, apud Westm. diem clausit extremum, et sepultus est apud Cantuar. cum magna solempnitate, mense marcii anno domini 1412. Hic Henricus ultimo anno regni sui dominum Thomam, filium suum, constituit ducem Clarencie.

1413: 1. Post Henricum quartum successit filius suus primogenitus Henricus quintus, qui primo anno regni patris sui ab eodem constitutus princeps Wallie. Hic coronatus est in Regem apud Westm. a domino Thoma Arundell, Cant. archiepiscopo, dominica in passione domini, que dominica tunc accidit nono die mensis Aprilis, in anno domini millesimo cccccxij^o ex consensu maioris partis omnium dominorum regni tam temporalium quam spiritualium.

Hic constituit in coronacione sua thesaurarium Anglie comitem de Arundell, et Magistrum Henricum de Bewford, auunculum suum, episcopum Wynt., cancellarium Anglie. Item circa iiij^{xx} armigeros nobiles erexit in milites.

Anno primo Henrici quinti circa Epiphaniam domini consurrexerunt aduersus Regem multi Lollardi ac infideles, conspiracione facta, inter quos capitales erant, prout dicebatur, Dominus Johannes de Oldecastell, tunc dominus de Cobham per uxorem, item dominus T.

,¹ et dominus Rogerus de Acton, miles, cum exercitu copioso vt Regem apud Westm. nocte preoccuparent.

Set dominus Rex, per quendam carpentarium London.² premunitus, circa horam decimam in nocte, accepto consilio procerum et nobilium qui cum illo erant, eadem nocte egressus est cum suis de palacio Westm., et ingressus est in campum in quem prefati Lollardi disposuerant intrasse; et nutu dei eadem nocte captus est predictus dominus Rogerus de Acton, miles, cum pluribus aliis fautoribus suis. Quod audiens dominus de Cobham, qui illuc propere festinabat, noctanter aufugit. Et sic execrabilis turba Lollardorum fugit in tabernacula sua. Benedictus deus per omnia qui tradidit impios.

Postera autem die, data sententia mortis per Justiciarios domini

¹ dominus T.—H.; dominus T.—T.—K. Probably Sir Thomas Talbot, who was one of the Lollard leaders excepted from pardon on 28th March, 1414. Cf. Goodwin, Henry V., p. 32, ex Rot. Claus. See also Engl. Hist. Rev. xx. 642.

² His name was John de Burgh; cf. Cal. Pat. Rolls, Henry V, i. 157. On 5 Jan. he was rewarded with a grant of 10 marks yearly from the issues of Norfolk.

Regis in illos, qui contra dominum Regem consurrexerant, suspensus est prefatus dominus Rogerus de Acton, miles, cum aliis multis in furcis erectis in campo prelibato, vbi rebellare cogitauerant.

Anno secundo Henrici quinti post festum pasche idem dominus 1414: 2. Rex tenuit parliamentum apud Leycet'. In quo quidem parlamento concessit gratiam Henrico, filio et heredi domini Henrici de Percy qui occisus fuerat apud Schrewesbiry, vt Angliam intraret ad comitatum Northumbrie possidendum. Iste Henricus de Percy fuit in Scocia cum duce Albanie, quasi per decem annos, et licet dominus Rex concesserat ei gratiam reuertendi, impeditus tamen est introitus eius fere per duos annos. In predicto eciam parlamento Henricus Rex exaltauit duos fratres suos in duces, viz. dominum Johannem in ducem Bedfordie, et dominum Humfredum in ducem Glouestr.; nam dominus Thomas, secundogenitus, factus est dux Clarencie viuente adhuc patre suo Rege Henrico quarto.

Anno tercio Henrici quinti, idem dominus Rex preparauit exercitum 1415: 3. fortem et grandem ad recuperandam hereditatem suam in Normannia; quia miserat ad Regem Francie pro filia sua in vxorem ducenda, et pro hereditate terrarum ad coronam Anglie pertinencium rehabenda. Set in vtraque petitione sua a Rege Francie et nobilibus ibidem non modicum fuerat spretus et contemptus. Propter quod Rex Henricus, de toto regno suo ducum, comitum, baronum et militum collecto exercitu copioso, transfretauit in Normanniam cum multitudine nauium inaudita, viz. numero M. et DC.¹, et applicuit iuxta portum de Hareflete;² circa festum assumptionis beate marie³ obsedit predictam urbem de Hareflete sibi resistentem. Deinde circa festum beati Michaelis sequens predicta ciuitas de Hareflete, vltius resistere non valens, sibi reddita est cum omnibus hominibus et contentis in eadem. Quo facto Rex aliquantulum ibidem moratus constituit capitaneum et custodem ciuitatis predictae comitem de Dorcet, auunculum suum, mille hominibus cum illo retentis.

In predicta vero obsidione tanta lues nostrates affixit, et specialiter fluxus ventris ac sanguinis nostros homines affixit et depressit in tantum vt fere quinque millia de nostris predicto morbo interirent. Inter quos magister Ricardus Cowrtney, episcopus Norwicensis, comes de Arundell,⁴ comes de Suthfolke, dominus Willelmus Butteler, dominus Johannes Sotheworthe, dominus Hugo de Standish, et multi alii nobiles ex diuersis regni partibus mortui sunt.

¹ M. et vj C^o. K.

² Harfleur.

³ 15th August.

⁴ Arundel suffered from the flux, but returned to die on 13th Oct. 1415 at home.

Deinde dominus Rex cum decem vix milibus hominum a predicta vrbe de Harflete ad Calisiam per terram Francie transire disposuit; quod tuentes Franci pontes super flumina fregerunt, et regem cum exercitu circuire fecerunt. Tandem appropinquauit iuxta quandam villam et castellum nomine Assyngcowrte, quod a Calisia quasi xxx. miliaribus distat; vbi exercitus Francorum validus et innumerabilis obuam sibi venit; missisque ex vtraque parte nunciis inire bellum¹ disponebant. Sicque aciebus hinc inde dispositis, die veneris in festo sanctorum Crispini et Crispiniani, mense Octobri, circa horam diei terciam, anno domini 1415, congressi sunt vsque ad horam vesperarum; tandem vero diuino nutu disponente regi Anglie cessit victoria, et occisi sunt de Francorum exercitu vulgus quasi innumerabile circiter xx. Ml. hominum. Inter quos interibant dux Brabancie, dux Barre, Archiepiscopus Senonensis, item constabularius Francie, quatuor comites, et alius dux de Lannson² cum iiij^{xx} aliis dominis et militibus. Captique sunt dux Aurelianus,³ dux de Burboyn, Sr Bursegraunt,⁴ Marescallus Francie, comes Rychmundie, frater ducis Britannie, et alius quidam comes, cum aliis duobus dominis. Dictumque fuit a fidedignis quod exercitus Francorum erat quasi centum milia hominum, cum exercitus Anglorum vix fuerint decem milia viri.

Propterea cum Angli vicissent primam cohortem belli ceperunt captiuos multos. Set superueniente nouo ac recente exercitu parato ad bellum, coacti sunt necessario licet inuiti, suos captiuos iugulare; quod videntes Franci, et imbres sagittariorum non valentes sustinere, percipientes confugerunt.

Rex igitur Anglie cum exercitu suo capta preda spoliis cum concaptiuis cepit pergere versus Calisiam, sepultis prius suis aut secum transumptis. Nam, sicut dicebatur, vix quadraginta viri ceciderunt ex parte Anglorum; inter quos dux Ebor., comes Suthfolke, et dominus Ricardus Kyghlay, miles, ceciderunt, quod sine dubio diuino factum consilio credimus, cum de tot et tam nobilibus viris tam pauci triumphum reportarunt. Moratus est autem Rex apud ciuitatem Calisie vsque ad festum beati Martini proxime sequens, et tunc cum omnibus suis applicuit ad terram Anglie in portu Douer.; et sic profectus est London., obuante sibi plebe, et deum super omnibus collaudante, positisque captiuis in turri London. sub custodia, et Rege exercitui valedicante, vnusquisque domum repedauit.

Circa principium quadragesime eiusdem anni ex precepto et iussu

¹ bellum inire K.

² Orleans.

³ Alençon.

⁴ Boucicault.

Regis intrauit Henricus de Percy, et peruenit ad Regem apud Couentr., qui benigne et graciose suscepit eum.¹

Anno 4^o Henrici quinti, idem Rex tenuit parliamentum apud 1416: 4. London. cito post pascha. In quo fecit predictum Henricum de Percy militem et comitem Northumbr., suscipiens ab illo in pleno parlamento homagium et iuramentum fidelitatis.

In hoc² tempore Imperator Alemannie venit in Franciam, deinde ad Calisiam ex consensu et voluntate Regis Anglie, et sic in Angliam, cum mille equitibus; et summe ac honorificentissime susceptus est a Rege obuiante sibi cum xx. milibus decenter ornatis et introducente in ciuitatem London. cum magna gloria, in palacium Westm. honestissime preparatum. Fuitque idem Imperator in Anglia per dimidium anni et vltra, et factus est consors et sodalis collegii Sancti Georgii Wyndeshor.

Iste prefatus Imperator venit causa tractandi inter Reges Anglie et Francie. Set de hoc parum vel modicum profecit. Nam Franci, licet de pace cum Rege tractabant, insidiose tamen parabant classem copiosam cum nouem maximis nauibus conductis de ciuitate Januensi, vocatis carrykes, et obsidebant ostium fluminis Secane, per quod victualia uenirent ad ciuitatem de Hareflete nuper captam per Regem Anglie.

Vnde Dominus Rex ex hoc multum commotus parauit nauigium, vt predictam obsidionem remoueret. Igitur, magno apparatu nauium secundum ordinationem regalem disposito, Dux Bedfordie, Comes Marchie, Comes Huntyngton, et Comes Sarum, cum multis aliis proceribus regni et exercitu copioso, acceptis victualibus, nauigauerunt versus Hareflete; et videntes supradictam multitudinem nauium hostilium iuxta Hareflete positam, cito congressi sunt pariter; et infra tres horas, quo bellare ceperunt, vires hostium defecerunt, aliis necatis, quibusdam submersis, et multis in fugam conuersis. Sicque gracia Dei Angli victores fuerunt, et arreptis tribus magnis carrykes, et vna in mare submersa, cum vno hulke et aliis compluribus³ nauibus de manibus inimicorum, refocillauerunt ciuitatem de Hareflete cum victualibus sufficienter copiosis. Deinde in Angliam sani et incolumes, fauente Deo, feliciter reuersi sunt.

Circa festum beati Michaelis eiusdem anni Dominus Rex transfretauit cum Imperatore vsque ad Calisiam, vt per mediacionem eiusdem Imperatoris pax inter regna reformaretur. Set Francis semper nequiter et subdole de pace tractantibus, tractatus ille nichil seu modicum profecit. Quapropter Imperator et Rex Anglie, pace inter se per iuramentum firmata, valedicentes, vterque cum suis ad propria remeavit.

¹ Richard Grey of Codnor was commissioned to receive Percy and bring him to the King on 5th Feb. 1416 (Cal. Pat. Rolls, i. 399).

² quo A. ³ pluribus A.

1417: 5. Anno regni Regis Henrici quinto idem Rex, videns se a Francis per multas expensas derisum, et in diuersis subdolis tractatibus deceptum pariter et illudum, congregauit exercitum copiosum ex multis nobilibus regni ad villam de Southhampton; vbi, audito quod hostes sui congregauerant classem in mari, direxit ad illos Comitem de Huntingdon cum aliis dominis cum multitudine numerosa; qui, cum appropinquassent hostibus suis, super mare statim inierunt certamen et victores dei gracia extiterunt; captisque magnis nauibus et carrikes de inimicis ad Regem reuersi sunt; qui letificatus est in aduentu eorum audito quod prospere egissent. Vnde circa festum beate M. Magdalene idem Rex cum toto exercitu suo transfretauit in Normanniam.

Preterea notandum est, quod in loco suo debito pretermissum est, viz. quod anno tercio Henrici Regis, dum idem Dominus Rex prepararet exercitum suum prope Southampton ad transfretandum in Normanniam, quidam magni domini, viz. dominus Ricardus Conesburgh, Comes Cantabrig., frater Ducis Ebor., et dominus le Scrope, ac eciam dominus Thomas Gray de Northumbria, cum aliis, habito consilio et tractatu conspirauerunt aduersus dominum Henricum Regem, ipsum per insidias nequiter et maliciose occidere cupientes, vt fama vulgi laborabat. Set Comes Marchie, vt dictum erat, qui eorum consilium iniquum secrete cognoscebat, omnia eorum machinamenta Regi manifestabat. Quapropter Dominus Rex cito conuocari fecit omnes duces, comites, barones et proceres; et inquisitione facta repertum est, partim ex confessione publica dominorum predictorum, et partim per litteras suas cum suis armis sigillatas, quod communicationem de morte Domini Regis sine dubio pertractassent.

Vnde infra breue apud villam de Southhampton capta inquisitione de ducibus, comitibus et nobilioribus tocius regni, per sacramentum illorum inuentum est coram iusticiariis predictos dominos in mortem Regis consensisse.

Quapropter data sententia quidam illorum per plateas ciuitatis cum equis tracti sunt, et omnes tandem predicti tres domini capitibus decollati sunt.

Anno quinto Henrici Regis quinti, vt supradictum est, circa festum beate Marie Magdalene¹ idem Dominus Rex cum toto exercitu suo transfretauit in Normanniam; fuitque ibi per tres annos continuos et vltra, vsque ad festum Purificacionis² in quarto anno sequente; in cuius temporis spacio conquisiuit totam Normanniam, licet plures perdidit de magnatibus et proceribus regni in obsidionibus villarum et castrorum ibidem. Nam in capcione ville de Caen¹ dominus Jacobus de Haryngton mortale vulnus accepit. Apud obsidionem de Falays² mortuus est dominus de Haryngton. Apud Louers³ dominus de Skales,⁴ dominus Darcy,⁵ et dominus Eadmundus de Thorpe. Item apud obsidionem de Roen obiit Comes de Somersete, Comes de Mortayn,⁶ dominus de Talbot, dominus Johannes Blount, et Prior de Kilmaynande⁷ de Hibernia. Item apud Chirburghe⁸ obiit dominus le Gray de Codnore,⁹ et dominus de Castiloygne¹⁰ de Vasconia. Item apud Frenay vicecomes¹¹ dominus Karolus de Nauernia,¹² frater Regis Nauernie. Item apud Vernale de Perce¹³ dominus de Neuell.¹⁴ Item in tractatu et convencione pacis¹⁵ dominus Ricardus Arundell. Item in Troys en Chaumpayne dominus Willelmus Bowser. Item apud Melon Comes Desmond de Hibernia, dominus le Scrope de Bolton, et dominus le Bowser.

¹ 22nd July, 1417; Henry embarked at Southampton on 23rd July.

² 2nd Feb. 1421.

Igitur in predictis obsidionibus et guerris mortui sunt, secundum estimacionem illorum qui interfuerunt, fere centum milites cum vulgo innumerabili.

A^o 8^o Regis Henrici idem Dominus Rex transiuit de Normannia 1420: 8. Parisius et vsque ad Troes in Chaumpayne cum exercitu xx milium dominorum procerum, et cum vulgari plebe; duxitque ibi in vxorem dominam Katerinam, filiam Regis Francie, in festo sancte Trinitatis; fuitque ibidem in Francia vsque ad festum Natalis domini. Deinde circa festum purificationis beate Marie eodem anno venit Rex ad Cantuar.¹⁶ et post London,¹⁷ obuante sibi plebe et gaudente cum muneribus copiosis.

Dominica vero tertia in quadregesima apud London. regina Katerina solempniter coronata est apud Westmonasterium, presentibus ibidem ducibus, comitibus, episcopis, et proceribus quasi totius regni cum dominabus quamplurimis et apparatu precioso.

Set, heu, quod dolendum dico, parum ante pascha eodem anno infortunio¹⁸ casu dominus Thomas, Dux de Clarens, frater Regis,

¹ Caen; Sept. 1417.

² Falaise; Jan. 1418.

³ Louviers; June, 1418.

⁴ Robert, fifth Lord Scales.

⁵ John lord Darcy.

⁶ This is an error; neither Somerset nor Mortayn died at Rouen.

⁷ Sir Thomas Butler, Prior of Kilmainham.

⁸ Cherbourg; 1418.

⁹ Richard Grey, fourth baron; but he did not die till 1419.

¹⁰ Pontius, Sire de Castelhon.

¹¹ Fresnay-le-Vicomte; 1420.

¹² Charles of Navarre.

¹³ Verneuil in Perche; Vernayle, K.; 17th August, 1424.

¹⁴ John Neville.

¹⁵ factus MSS.

¹⁶ Rex cum regina Cantuariam K.

¹⁷ post hoc Londonias K.

¹⁸ infortunato K.

dominus Gilbertus Vmfravile, comes de Kyme, dominus Johannes le Gray, comes Tankyrville, et dominus le Roos per Francos et Scotos occisi fuerunt. Insuper Comes de Huntyngton, Comes de Somerset, et Comes de Suthfolk¹ capti sunt cum ceteris militibus et generosis, qui ibidem interfecti et capti fuerunt.

Post festum autem Pasche idem Rex² cum Regina et aliis proceribus regni proficisci cepit versus Eboracum, vbi honestissime et magnifice susceptus est cum regina; optulitque ei predicta ciuitas³ munera magnifica et regi congrua cum honore. Deinde peregre profectus est versus Brydlyngton et Beuerlay, regina remanente Ebor. Auditaque morte ducis Clarencie, fratris sui, et aliorum supranotatorum in Francia vehementissime doluit, veniensque ad Pontemfractum, vbi regina conuenerat, cito transiuit Lincolniam ad installacionem Magistri Ricardi Flemying, nuper episcopi electi ibidem. Deinde London. transmeauit ad parliamentum in primo mensis Maii ibidem tenendum; ad quod parliamentum venit Comes Dowglas de Scocia cum plenaria potestate illius regni pro tractatu pacis inter regna; treugeque biennales concesse sunt et firmate.⁴

1421: 9. Hoc anno⁵ dominus Rex, congregato exercitu de nobilioribus regni, ante festum Sancti Johannis Baptiste transfretauit in Franciam: mansitque ibidem per totum annum; cepit⁶ plures ciuitates et villas, inter quas Mewes in Bry capta est, vrbs fortissima, auro, argento et diuiciis infinitis repleta. Circa cuius vrbs obsidionem Comes Wygornie occisus est, et inclitus dominus Johannes Clifford, cuius corpus delatum est in Angliam et sepultum est apud canonicos de Bolton in Crauen.

1422: 10. Eodem anno circa conceptionem beate Marie natus est ex Regina Katerina apud Wyndeshor Henricus primogenitus Henrici quinti.⁷

Hoc anno⁸ postquam Regina Katerina transfretauit ab Anglia in Normanniam ad Regem⁹; cito post Rex decidit in languorem exiciale, qui continuauit cum illo¹⁰ vsque ad mortem, et in festo decollacionis sancti Johannis Baptiste diem clausit extremum, postquam regnauerat ix. annis et v. mensibus¹¹; cuius ossa deportata sunt¹² London., et sepulta honorifice apud Westmonasterium.

Anno octauo Henrici Regis Sexti in festo sancti Leonardi idem Rex coronatus est apud London. Circa festum nativitatis sancti Johannis

¹ An error; Suffolk was not at Baugh.

² idem dominus Rex K. ³ vrbs Ebor. K.

⁴ et capta est trenga inter regna Anglie et Scocie, et firmata est pax pro duobus annis K.

⁵ A^o nono Henrici regis quinti idem K. ⁶ cepitque K.

⁷ Eodem anno . . . quinti K. puts after next paragraph.

⁸ A^o decimo Henrici Regis quinti idem dominus rex K.

⁹ ad illum K.

¹⁰ tenuit illum K.

¹¹ postquam . . . mensibus om. K.

¹² deportantur K.

Baptiste transfretavit in Franciam cum duce Ebor., duce de Northfolke ; duce de Bedford existente in Normannia et expectante aduentum regis cum Duce Burgundie, et aliis comitibus et nobilioribus regni quamplurimis et cum exercitu copioso : vbi eodem anno circa festum beati Michaelis submersus est Dominus le Roos¹ et dominus Johannes Butteler occisus.²

¹ Thomas, Lord de Roos, arowned in the Marne on 18th August, 1430.

² vbi eodem . . . occisus om. H.

same ȝere he brak the prison and wente away. And the same ȝere purposed the forsayde syr John to haue slayn the kyng and his lordes at Eltham, that is to seye the xij day atte nyght. And þ^t same nyght the mayere of London hadde warnyng therof. And he toke the aldermen and all the wardes of London, and made grete wache that nyght. And þ^t same nyght the mayre toke John Burgate, carpenter, and many oþer of the same sekt and consentyng to the forsayde syr John. And þ^t same ȝere the xij^e day fell vp on þ^e saterday. And the Moneday next after the Kyng whit his lordes come fro Eltham thorowe London vnto Westm. And on the morn after at nyȝth the kyng and his lordes toke the feld: for he hadde tydyng þ^t the forsayde syr John and syr Roger of Acton schulde be in the same feld the Wednesday next folowyng w^t xxv. M^l. people for to distroie the Kyng and all his lordes: and the same nyȝht the Kynges men toke of hem iiij^{xx} and moo of syr John Oldecastell meyne. And the friday after was forjuged of such traytours atte Westm. lxix, and led to the Tour. And the same day xij of hem weren drawe from the Towr vnto Neugate. And on the morn after were xxv moo of hem drawen from the Tour vnto Newgate, and forth all in fere vnto seint Giles; and there was made New galows for hem. And there thei were hanged euerychon: and vij of hem were brent Galows and all, and xxix henge styll on the Galowes. And the ffriday, the xix day of Janyuer, were iiij moo drawen and hanged: of wiche one was a preest þ^t hyght syr John Beuerley, the ij was John Burgate, the thirde a texte writer of sent Jones strete, and the iiij was a Glouer on London Brigge. Also the same ȝere, the xxv day of Janyuer, was a preest that hit syr Water drawen and hanged for treson: the weche preeste, as men seydon, had bought for Cobham as many bowes, arowes and other stuff as cost ix mark. And þat same ȝere was taken the forsaide syr Roger of Acton. And the viij day of ffeuerer after he was dampned for treson. And he was drawen and hanged at sent Gyles, and there was he buryed vnder the same Galowes. And in the same ȝere atte Canterbury died syr Thomas of Arundell, Erchebisshopp of Canterbury, the xix day of ffeuerer. And in the same ȝere was the parlement atte Leycester: and at þ^e parlement was my lord syr John, the Kynges brother, made Duke of Bedford, and syr Vmfray his brother Duke of Gloucester, and syr Ric. the Dukes Brother of York Erle of Cambrigge. And the same [ȝere] was syr Herry Chicheley Bisshop of sent Davys &c.¹

¹ The notice for the year then ends as in H. (see Nicholas, pp. 98, 99), but reading Neauncer and Tybbey; and giving the date And the xxj day of August next after the forsayde John Neauncer.

The notice for 1418-19 has a different beginning :

This same yere was John Bryon fyrst chosen shereue be the mayre, but hit fortun-ed so for hym þ^t w^t Inne vij nyght after that he hadde I-rede and toke his othe at Westm. he felle in to tempse as he wold have esed hym self, as men seyth, be 3onde be seint Katerynes, comynge fro þ^e bantenent wech þ^t tyme was atte Stratford, nat w^t standyng þ^t all his sergians were there w^t hym, the weche sergeantys w^t help of the millenere that there was tokyn hym vp w^t an hoke, but forsothe afterward hadde he neuer gode day but peyned and dyed w^t ynne the seuenyth : and in his stede was chose John Perneys.

This is the original of the briefer notice in Julius B ii.¹

(2) LONDON CHRONICLE FOR 1421-30

On p. 92 above reference is made to a London Chronicle for 1421-47 which is preserved in a transcript of John Stow's in Harley MS. 540 ff. 40-5. As there pointed out from 1430 onwards it is merely a somewhat shorter version of the Chronicle printed by Dr. Brie as F.² But the earlier part preserves some peculiar notices of which that for the first year is the only one of importance.

The 8 of H 5 on the Sunday after the day of S. Matthe in y^e lent dame Katheryn was crowned qwene at Westminster. And on estar even next folowinge Thomas, duke of Clarence, y^e kyngs brothar, by the water of Leyre was slayne w^t othar : there was taken prisonars the earle of Huntynghton, the earle of Somerset and his brothar, the lord Fitzwarar and othar. The bastard of Clarence w^t strengthe gat his fathar's body, brought it vnto England and buried [it] in the priory of Christ churche at Cantorbury, besyde kynge Henry the fourthe, his fathar.³ Henry the 6 was borne at Windsor of S. Nicholas day, anno 1421. In the same yere on the xij of August Bartilmew Plomar, dwelling in Finkes lane besyde Cornehill, set vp the newe wetharcoke on seint Pawles steple in London. In the yere 1422 Kynge H. havynge gotten Mews in Bry sent over into England prisonars 160, which landed at Hampton on the 1 of July, from whence they were brought in carts to the towr of London.⁴ Kynge H. beinge sicke made his testament, apoynted his treasure and jewells to be solde, his dettes to be payde, as well to the pleasaunce of his souldiours as to othar that he owght good vnto in Englund, and on Fraunce, and ordeyned John, his brothar, duke of Bedforde to be theyr regent and governor of Fraunce and Normandy ; and he comitted the kepinge of

¹ Chronicles of London, p. 72.

³ Quoted by Stow, Annales, 361.

² Brut, pp. 456-90.

⁴ Id., ib.

H. his yonge sonne and prynce to sir Henry Beaufort, byshope of Winchester, and to sir Thomas Beaufort, duke of Excestar.¹

This is interesting as giving the source of the quotations made by Stow. The other notices are brief; the only ones worth quoting are:

1423-4. John Mortimer, Knight, brake out of the towr of London, and was taken vpon the towre wharffe, and ther was sore wounded and beaten, and on the morow brought to Westminster, iudged and condemned, brought bake agayne to the towre, and there layde on a hirdle and drawne thwrghe the cite of London to Tiborne, and there hanged, heded: his hed set on London bridge.

This comes from the same source as the longer notice in Dr. Brie's Appendix E.²

Under 1426-7 there is the note (peculiar to this Chronicle):

Thomas Beawford, duke of Excestar, died at Grenewitche, and was buried at S. Edmonds bury.

(3) LONDON CHRONICLE FOR 1446-52

Arundel MS. 19 at the College of Arms has a peculiar London Chronicle for 1446 to 1452, which seems to represent one of the earlier originals of the Main City Chronicle. The manuscript belonged to Robert Hare (d. 1611), an antiquarian friend of John Stow,³ and afterwards to Lord William Howard. Stow had clearly made use of it, though he does not quote the most interesting passages. The whole of the original chronicle is in the same handwriting. Down to 1432 it is an abbreviated copy of the version of that year. From 1432 to 1446 the entries are very meagre. The year 1446-7 begins with an account of the fight between the armourer and his man,⁴ and a notice of the death of Humphrey of Gloucester and the fate of his servants.⁵ The notice for this year ends:⁶

This same yere þe vj day of August dezeside maister Gilbert Worthington, þe person of Holborne, þat was a doctour and a good prechour.

The next year 1447-8 has a similar notice:⁶

In this yeer the xxvj day of Octobre⁷ died maister William Lichfeld, person of Alhalowes þe more in Temstrete, the whiche was a good prechour and an holy man þat made in his dayes M^{ij} iij xx and iij sermones, as it was founde in his bokes of his own hande writing.

For 1448-9 there is no notice.⁸ The notice for 1449-50 describes the murder of Adam Moleyns, the death of Suffolk 'behedid for treson in the

¹ Id. 362.

² Brut, p. 452; see also Chronicles of London, pp. 282-3.

³ See Survey of London, vol. i, p. lxxviii.

⁴ Gregory's Chronicle, p. 187.

⁵ Chronicles of London, p. 157.

⁶ Stow, Annales, p. 386.

⁷ i. e. at the end of the mayoral year on 26th Oct. 1448; see his epitaph ap. Survey of London, ii. 321.

⁸ Cf. p. 94 above; thus it resembles the Continuations of S.

see,' and the loss of Normandy. Jack Cade's rebellion is described in similar terms to the common narrative of the Vitellius Chronicle, though more briefly. But the account of Cade's death is peculiar:

On þe Sondag seuenyght aftyr þat þe said Capteyn was slayne byside Maydeston in Kente by Alisaunder Yden, squier and shereve of Kente.

Gregory's Chronicle (p. 194) has the same date—12th July. Most accounts put the scene of Cade's death in the Weald of Sussex; but the Short English Chronicle (p. 68) had originally: 'And so the xij day of Jule John Cade was take in Kentt.'

The notice for 1449-50 ends:

And þe same yere afore Mighelmas the Duke of York came out of Ireland, and toke þe baron of Dudley and the abbot of Gloucestre and putte them in þe castell of Ludlow, and sone aftyr he toke Gergrauē, keper of þe kinges benche at Lundun, and sente hym to the castell of Ludlow.

This incident has been known only through Stow's quotation in his Annales, p. 392.

The notice for 1450-1 is very similar to the accounts in the Vitellius Chronicle (Chronicles of London, p. 162) and Gregory's Chronicle (pp. 196-7). The following is a little more precise:

And on the morne that was Wednesday [1st December], at aftir none and bifore, þer were made cryes in Lundun by þe Duke of Yorke and Duke of Northfolke, that no man shuld robbe nor take any good within þe cite, nether wythoute, vpon payne of deth.

The notice for 1451-2 is the most interesting passage in the Chronicle, and is printed in full. The movements of York and the King do not seem to be given anywhere else with quite so much precision. The Chronicle ends so abruptly that we may fairly assume that this narrative was written very soon after the events which it describes.

Þe xxx yere of Kyng Henry þe sixte. This yere on Wednesday the xvj day of Feverere þe kyng with þe lordis rode toward the Duke of Yorke for to take hym, because he reised peple to come downe and take þe Duke of Somersete; but whan the Duke of Yorke herde here of, he toke another waye and so came toward Lundun. And also sone as þe Kynge herde þerof he sente letters to the Meir, Aldirmen and comons of Lundun, on seint Mathies day,¹ þat þei schuld kepe the citee and suffre nat þe Duke of Yorke to come þerin; wherfore was made greet wacche in þe citee, þe whiche was tolde þe Duke of Yorke, wherfore he lefte Lundun wey and wente ouer Kyngston brygge. And on Sondag² next aftir, þat was þe first Sondag of Lente, the Kyngis vaward cam to London erly in þe mornynge and loggid in Southwerke. And on þe Monday after, in þe morning þei were remeued fro þens into Kente. And at after none þe same day the Kyng came to London with his oost, and so went into Southwerke and loggid at seint Marie Overeys. And the Duke of Yorke picched his ffield aboute Dertford whith greet ordinaunce. And whiles þe kyng lay stille at seint Marie Overeys bysshoppe¹ rood between þe kyng and þe Duke of Yorke to sette hem at reste and pees. But þe Duke of Yorke seid he wold haue þe Duke of Somerset, or elles he wold dye therefore. And on Wednysday² next folowyng þe kyng with his oost rode to Blakheith, and forth ouer Schoters hylle to Wellyng, and þer loggid þat day and þe morue. And on Thursday at aftir noon þer was maad a poyntement bytwene þe Kyng and þe Duke of Yorke by þe mene of lordis. And on þe morue, þat was Fryday,³ þe Kyng ensemblid his oost on þe Blake heith afore none; and þere abode þe comyng of þe Duke of Yorke after þe poyntement maad ovir evyne. And in [the] Kyngis oost was nombred xx^m fyghting men, and men seide þe Duke of Yorke hadde as many⁴ with moche greet stuff and ordinaunce. And att þe last þe Duke of Yorke cam with xl hors to þe Kyng aboute none, and obeyed hym to his legeaunce; and wyth [him] þe Erl of Dewynshire and þe lord Cobham, þe which helde with þe Duke of Yorke and were in oost with hym. And þe Kyng toke hem to grace and alle.

¹ 24th February.

² 27th February.

¹ Something is missing, or the true reading may be bysshoppes. The envoys were the Bishops of Winchester and Ely, with the Earls of Warwick and Salisbury and some others. See p. 368 below.

² 1st March.

³ 3rd March. The date is usually given as 1st March (Paston Letters, i. 101). The precision of this account is conclusive.

⁴ The account on pp. 367-68 below gives 23,000.

IV. THE BRUT

1413-17

FROM THE VERSION OF 1430

As explained on pp. 132-33 above, the history of the earlier years of Henry V in the Version of 1430 is interesting for the light which it throws on the manner and date of the composition of the English Brut. I there stated that the first Chapter—March 1413 to Oct. 1416—seems to represent the common original more faithfully than does the corresponding Chapter¹ in the Version which ends in 1419. The differences are not, however, so great as to make it worth while to print this Chapter at length. Generally the Version of 1430 has fuller and better readings, though the 'tennis-ball story' is related more briefly; but down to the close of 1415 it does not add anything material. There is only one sentence which calls for quotation:

And the kyng, the worthi prynce, that god saue and kepe, wold fro thens to Caleis so stronge thorough the londe, and the ffrensshemen herd &c.²

This, or its original, must have been written whilst Henry V was still alive. There is a ring about it which suggests a Ballad original; if so, it was not the Battaile of Agincourt. The other Version (Brut, p. 377, ll. 10-13) reads: 'And whenne þe King saw þis, þat hit was welle stoffed both of vitaille and of men, þis worthi Prynce and King toke his leve, and went hym to Caleys warde by londe. And þe Frensch men herd' &c.

The Version of 1430 mentions that the Battle of Agincourt was fought:

by yonde the water of Somme and by the Riuer of Swerdis.

The 'River of Swords' is not named in the other Version (Brut, p. 379, l. 17). The reference appears in the Latin Brut (p. 317 below), but might come from the Gesta (p. 46) or The Battaile (Nicolas, p. 225).

The account of the Pageant at London is fuller: it describes the preparations of the citizens, and speaks of the streets as hung with Arras (cf. Gesta, pp. 61, 66). Both these points are omitted in the other Version, (Brut, p. 380).

The subsequent account of Sigismund's visit is much fuller and suggests strongly that we have here a record drawn up at the time. I will quote the most striking passages.

And there thei welcomyd hym with alle honoure and reuerence: and so the meyre and the aldremen, with the Comminalte, brought hym to seint Thomas Wateryng withoute Southewerke, and there the Kyng met with hym, with alle his lordis in good and riall araye, and ther was a worthi and a solempne metynge betwix the Emperoure and our Kyng, ther kyssid togederis and myche obeysaunce yche¹ shewid to othir and thankynge (cf. Brut, pp. 380-1).

¹ Brut, pp. 373-81.

² Cotton MS. Galba E viii. f. 133^{vo}; the other MSS. agree.

The bysshoppis stoden y-reuersid in her rialte with mitris and copis, with riall senseris sensinge hem bothe, and so broughte hem vp to the high auter (cf. Brut, p. 381, l. 7).

These two passages illustrate how the original has been condensed in the other Version. The following passages are distinct additions. The first is inserted after line 10 on p. 381.

And afturward thanne oure kynge shewid to the Emperoure the worthi and solempne, glorious, diuine seruicis of holy Chirche, bothe of Religious and othir: whiche sight and herynge plesyd hym moche, and moste passyngely [he] comendid the seruyse here in holy chirche aboue alle the londis and contreis that euyr he come ynne.

A somewhat fuller account of the arrival of William of Holland is then followed by the long original of p. 381, lines 14-20 in the printed text.

And thanne the Kyng toke the Emperoure, and toke hym to see the lande aboute, to knowe the worthinesse, and the good and gracious comoditeis in the londe: and thanne shewid hym Citeis and good tounys, and the rialte and good arays of the pepull that dwellid in hem. Whiche that plesid and likid welle his sight.

And thanne he brought hym to Castellis and maneris, there as all disportis weren, as huntynge and hawkyng in fforestis, parkis and chasis, and to diuerse Riueris for Whild foule. With that he comendid and preysid passenge.

And whanne he had sen alle the Rialte and disportis in the londe aboute, he thankid moche the Kyng of good herte and high loue and kyndenes, that he had don and shewid to hym of his high worthinesse and manhode, and seid that this lond myght be callid a lond of grete nobley and worthines, and plenteuous of good and riche pepull, and blessid of gouernaunce, with habundaunce of alle worthi comoditeis that longon for a londe.

And this worthy Emperoure takynge his leue of lordis and ladyes, and of alle the Rewme of Engeland, yaf hem many good blessingis with alle maner of thankyngis, went ouyr the see ayen: the Kyng and he to Caleis, and abiden &c.

The remainder of this narrative is only slightly longer than the other Version. At the end of the Chapter there is added an account of Bedford's victory off Harfleur,² similar to that in Nicolas' London Chronicle, pp. 104-5.

¹ euery A., B.

² This is omitted in B.

The second Chapter—Oct. 1416 to Nov. 1417—in the Version of 1430 is given in full below. As far as the landing in Normandy the two Versions are very similar, the only variation of importance being the more accurate date for Henry's leave-taking at London in the Version of 1430. In the narrative of the war there is a marked difference. In the Version ending at 1419 Henry is stated to have landed at Touques, and to have made Sir John Kighley captain of that place. The siege of Caen is described at some length, and the capture of Bayeux is attributed to Clarence. The account of the Earl of March's voyage and landing in Normandy is shorter than in the Version of 1430. The subsequent history of the campaign of 1417 is very brief. The Chapter closes with a notice of the capture and death of Oldcastle. In the Version of 1430 Henry is stated to have landed at 'Benvile', and to have made Clarence captain of Touques. The description of the siege of Caen is shorter. There is much more detail in the history of the expedition under the command of the Earl of March, who is here stated to have assisted the Duke of Gloucester at the siege of Bayeux before joining the King. The history of the subsequent campaign is much fuller, and the reference to 'Bayes' and 'Mortrival' is new. The narrative then goes back to describe Huntingdon's sea-fight in June, 1417, which does not appear at all in the other Version. After this follows a notice of the Council of Constance; the Version of 1419 has none, and the Version represented by Harley 53 and Davies Chronicle has a different one. Next comes a misplaced account of the murder of John of Burgundy, which is incorrectly assigned to the fifth year. The Chapter again concludes with the capture and execution of Oldcastle; though the substance is similar, the phraseology shows more than mere textual variation.

The two Versions only agree precisely for the capture of 'Loueris'; though much of the remainder of the history is clearly derived from the same sources, the Version of 1430 is (except for the siege of Caen) far the better. The story of the Earl of March in particular is superior, and appears to be much nearer the original; it reads like the description of an eyewitness, a theory which receives confirmation from the use of 'we' in one sentence of the copy in Harley 266.¹ The history of the subsequent campaign may also be based on personal knowledge. The rest of the matter which is peculiar to the Version of 1430 is closely paralleled by some of the London Chronicles,² with which the accounts of Huntingdon's sea-fight and the murder of John of Burgundy are almost identical.

It does not seem to be possible that the Version of 1430 was in this passage based on the earlier Version ending in 1419. If it were, the compiler would hardly have omitted the better account of the siege of Caen. I am therefore led to the conclusion that there was a Version of the Brut ending not later than 1417; to which in 1430 a Continuation was added, based in part on the London Chronicles, and in part on an independent use of the common stock of other material such as news-letters and John Page's Siege of Rouen.

If this Chapter of the Version of 1430 does not contain much that is new, it is of great interest for the light which it throws on the method in which the Brut was composed, and on the relation of that work to the London Chronicles.

¹ See p. 306 below.

² Nicolas, London Chronicle, 105-7; Chronicles of London, 71-3; they date the murder of Burgundy correctly. The error in the Brut may be due to a slavish following of the London Chronicle, simply omitting the names of the Mayor and Sheriffs; cf. what is said of 'Appendix D' on p. 85 above.

The text here given is based on Cotton Galba, E. viii = G., which has been collated with Harley 2256 = A. Harley 266 = B. Harley 753 = W.

I have retained Dr. Brie's lettering of the MSS. G. and A. so closely resemble one another, as to make it almost certain that one is copied from the other. B. is of much later date (towards the end of the Fifteenth Century), but has some superior readings, which suggest that it represents an earlier copy. W. only belongs to this version for the additions from the London Chronicles at the end; but in the next Chapter (on the Siege of Rouen) it follows the Version of 1430. Of a similarly composite character is a Manuscript which formerly belonged to Lord Amherst of Hackney; it is in the possession of Mr. Quaritch. See Quaritch's Catalogue 303, No. 879. It is not noticed by Dr. Brie. It is a small folio, on vellum, ff. 206, with 30 lines on a page. It ends in 1430, and like so many other manuscripts of that Version was written about 1450. It was at one time in the library of the Duke of Buccleuch at Dalkeith House. This copy resembles the Version ending in 1419 down to the beginning of the siege of Rouen, but from that point follows the Version of 1430; for the date of Henry's leave-taking in April, 1417, it reads: 'seint Markes day that was that tyme Hoktuysday.'¹

How Kynge Henry the V purposid and ordeynyd hym ouyr the see ayen in to ffraunce and normandye by counsell of hys lordis and cominnes off the Rewme.

And in the iiij^{te} yere of kynge henryis Regne the V. the kynge holdynge his parlement at Westem^r. in the bygynnyng of the monythe of Octobre, the whiche parlement endid aboute the puryfication of oure lady thanne nexte, by comen assent of alle the clergie and temperalte ther was grauntid to the kynge bothe dymes and tallagis to fulfille the kyngis purpos in holdynge and susteynyng of chalenge and right that he had to normandye and Guyane, his trew titull and right heritage. Wherefore the kynge chargid dukis, erlis, Baronys, knyghtis and squyeris to make hem redy in the beste and moste worthy aray that thei coude or myght, with all the strengthe of men of armys and archeris to helpe and strengthe hym yn his werris for the right of Engeland: and that thei alle be redy to Moustur² at Hampton in the Witsonweke thanne nexte comynge in alle her aray as they ought to Werre. And thanne the kynge ordeynyd and made by alle his worthi and gracious counsell, or he passid oute of Engeland, John the duke of Bedford, his brothir, leutenaunte, deffender and gouernere of his Rewme of Engeland to kepe and maynteyne his lawis in all maner rightis like as hym self were bodyly presente, and to kepe the londe in quyte reste and pees, with alle maner of rightwisnesse duryng his absence, be alle maner of equyte and Justnesse to his ayen comynge, and in mayntenynge of³ alle right Spirituall and temperall.

¹ As also does Cotton. MS. Claudius A. viii. f. 5^{vo}.

² Moustre A.; B. ³ of om., B.

And thanne whanne the kynge had this don, and set here alle thyngis in his kynde and made hym self redy to his viage and pourpose¹: thanne the second day aftur seint Markis day that tho was Hoktewisday² oure kynge come rydyng fro Westem'. vnto seint poulis in london, and he alight and offrid, and thanne come ayen and toke his hors and rode thorough the Cite of london takynge hys leue of alle pepull as welle of pore as of³ riche, prayinge hem all in generall too preye for hym to almyghti god to spede hym and all his compeny well in her viage: and so he rode forthe to hampton, and there he restid and abode till he had gaderid his retenewe to hym, and alle the nauce of Shippis grete and smale togederis, and lete alle these Shippis ben well stuffid with vitailis as longid for suche a pepull, and also with alle othir maner of stuffe that longit to werre,⁴ as armure, Gunys smalle and grete, Trepgettis and Engynes, with bastell,⁵ bryggis of lethur, scalynge ladderis, and mallis of led, and pykowis, mattakkis and shouelis; and of alle maner ynstrumentis the kynge ordeynyd and had grete plente to his nede.

And thanne the kynge Shippid at portismougthe with alle his worthi retenewe and toke the see and seilid ouyr to⁶ the costis of normandye, and londid on seint petris day, lammesse, at Benvile: and at his londynge he made of his worthinesse xliiij knygtis. And thanne the⁷ kynge herynge of many enemyes vpon the see, that ix grete Carrikis and othir moo grete hulkis and Shippis were ordeynyd and lay to take his Shippis: Tho the kynge comaundid the erle of the Marche to byn cheef cheuentayne, and assygnyd many lordis with hym, with men of armys and archeris, to take his Carrikis and Shippis, and⁸ go ayen to the see to Skymoure the see that non of his enemyes enterid the londe in no partye to lette nor to distrobull his viage and iorney.

And thanne the Erle with alle his compeny at the kyngis ordynaunce yeden forthe with the Shippis and kepte the see⁹ and the see costis. And thanne the kynge toke forthe his wey with his hoste and come to the Castell of¹⁰ Toke, and sent his heroudis to the Capteyne and to the pepull that were with ynne, and comaundid hem to yeld the Castelle vnto hym or elles thei shold deie euyryche oon withoute eny othir grace.

¹ pourposid G.

² The common text (Brut, 382) has: Saint Markes day, þat was þat tyme Hocwednesday; which is impossible, for in 1417 St. Mark's Day fell on a Sunday.

³ of om. A., B. ⁴ werres B. ⁵ bastyles and sowes B.

⁶ to om. B. ⁷ oure B. ⁸ to B.

⁹ kepte the shippes and the see B. ¹⁰ of om. B.

And thanne the Capteyne with othir of his compenye comen oute and knelid byforn the kyng, and besought of hym¹ mercy and grace, and brought the kyng² the keyes : and thanne the kyng comaundid to put out alle the ffrensshe pepull that weren withynne the Castell, and let hem go and passe sauf withoute more harme where thei wold.

And anon the kyng callid sir Thomas, his brothir, the duke of Clarence, and toke hym the keyes and made hym Capteyne of this Castelle of Toke : and he put there ynne engelisshe men ynowe to kepe the Castell sauf from the power of the ffrensshe men, to his grete worship, profite and honoure.

And there beside was the Castell of Loueris,³ and thedur sent the kyng the erle marchalle with a feire meyne of goode men of armys and archeris : and thanne thei come and sawtid thertoo, and they yolde⁴ it anon to the erle and come and brought to hym the keyes of the Castell, and he brought the keyes to the kyng⁵ : and thanne he voydid alle the ffrensshe pepull⁶ that he fonde in the castell at the kyngis comaundement ; and the kyng toke hym the keyis and made hym Capteyne of this same Castell of Louerys and of alle that longid therto.

And the kyng tho toke forth his iourney, and come to the toun of Cane that was a toun of grete rialte and strengthe : and whanne he was come therto, anon the kyng sent his heraudis in message to the Capteyne of the toun to dellyuyre hym his toun, and his Castell, whiche that was⁷ his owne propur heritage and right, or ellis he wold gete it with strengthe and saue none of her lyues.

And thei answerd vtirly that thei wold kepe it while thei myght endure : and thanne⁸ the kyng bisegid the toun a longe tyme, and shotte therto Gunnys, Trepgettis and engynes : and keste⁹ adoun wallis, and bete adoun howsis, and slowe moche pepull bothe in housis and eke in stretis : and so the duke of Clarence lay on that othir side of the toun, and bete adoun the wallis on his side, and at the laste he wanne ynne, and gate the toun on hem and slowe moche of the ffrensshe pepull.

And thanne the duke of Clarence lete yn his brothir into the toun with moche solempnyte and myrthe : and anon the kyng went to the Castell with his pepull, and comaundid it to ben yold to hym, or ellis vtirly thei shold deie : and anon the captayne come forthe in the

¹ bisought hym of A. ; bysought the kyng of B.

² brougt hym B.

³ Some place near Touques.

⁴ yolde om. G.

⁵ erle, and come and brougt the keyes to the kyng B.

⁶ pepull om. B.

⁷ is B.

⁸ thus A.

⁹ caste B.

kyngis presence, and bysoughte hym of grace and merci to yeue hym xiiij dayes respite if reskewis come, or ellis deliuyr hym keyes and Castell at his will: and so no reskewis come and the kyng had bothe Castell and town at ¹ his comaundement with all the oþer tounys, abbeyis, Castell, villagis that tho were in composicion to this toun² and castell of Cane.

And our kyng chargid alle the ffrensshe pepull to vide the toun, and comaundid all his men³ vpon lyf and dethe, no man so hardi to defoule ne robbe no women, but let hem passe free in pes: for this was the kyngis comaundement at the reuerence of our ladi marye,⁴ quene of heuene, and of alle comforte euyr worshippid and blessid mote she be. And ther⁵ passid oute of that toun in oo day moo thanne xv C. women at the kyngis wille and grace.

And thanne oure kyng lete stuff the toun and the Castell with Engelish pepull, and ordeynyd there two Capteynys, on for the toun and anothir for the Castell, and chargid hem vpon his legeaunce that placis to ben trewly and saufly kept to the profite and to the crowne of Engeland.

And now to speke of the worshipfull Erle of the Marche and of his companye that the kyng comaundid to skure and to scomoure⁶ the se for his enemyes: and to speke of his passage to and fro or he come ayen into normandye vnto the kyng: for whanne he had byn a while vpon the see with the Carrikis and Shippis the wynde aros and the waus with tempeste⁷ stronge, and hurlid foule togederis, that thei wenden alle to haue ben perissid and loste: and ther was at that same tyme downyd a Carrike and a balynger and all the pepull that weren there ynne: on whos soule god haue mercy, amen.

And thanne the maryneres with her shippis and oþer vesselle gate in with in the yle of Whight, and come bifore hampton, and there riden the storme to dethe.

And thanne thei come oute ayen out of Whight with her shippis, and seilid ouyr the see into normandye and londid at hoggis: and thanne the ffrensshe men that wonyd there ffleden and wold not abide hem.

And whanne thei were all londid thei token her horsis and reden forthe toward the kyng: and as thei reden ther come to hem an antony pigge, and he folowid the hoste all the wey as thei reden till thei come to a grete Washe,⁸ and ther thei drad to haue ben dede alle:

¹ and A., *G.*² toun om. *G.*³ englissh men A., *B.*⁴ ladi seint Marie A., *B.*⁵ And that ther G.; For ther *B.*⁶ to skevre and to skoure and to skeme *B.*⁷ tempestes *A.*⁸ Baie des Veys.

so the Watir had closid hem rounde aboute that thei myght nowere¹ gete oute, for the Watir was large and depe.

And thanne thei tho cried and prayed to seint George of helpe and socoure, and anon her bone was herd, and thei come oute sauf alle oute of the Wasshe, ythankid be god: and thanne thei toke a guyde to hem, a ffrensse man, that knewe alle the contre aboute, and he brought hem thorough a quyke sande and so into an yle: and there thei toke many ffrensse men prisoneris, and herborouyd hem self tho ij nyghtis in the ffelde: for the herd that the ffrensse men wold yeue hem bataill, but thei fledden and durste not abide.

And thanne thei² toke the wey there as the kynge was, and highid to hym ward alle that thei³ myght.

And thanne come messageris of the kyngis, and met with hem and with othir lordis, and bad hem high faste to Bayous in alle haste,⁴ a stronge toune with a Castell and strongly subarbid and myghti: thanne weren the englishe lordis loggid alle aboute this toune of Bayous, with the Castell and⁵ subarbis, to besege hem that weren withynne.

And thanne come sir Vmfray, the duke of Gloucestre, with a grete meyne of armys and archeris with Gunnys and othir stuffe, and wanne the toune and the Castell with the subarbis, and made it stronge with englishe pepull: and thanne thei toke her wey toward there as the kynge was hym self. And thanne the kynge toke his iourney to a toune that me callid argenton, that was a stronge toune and well wallid and welle stuffid with ffrensse pepull of defence.

And tho the kynge leid to⁶ his Gounys and barste doune the wallis: and thanne anon thei yold the toune to the kynge in condicion that thei moste haue her lyfis and goodis: and the kynge grauntid hem.

And thei yold vp to the kynge bothe toune and Castell, and the kynge comaundid the englishe hoste to lete the ffrensse men passe withoute eny skathe or shame or harme vpon⁷ peyne of dethe.

And⁸ with this toune and Castell weren yold to the kynge many tounys, vilagis, Castellis and pilis, that weren vndir her composission: and at that tyme the kynge departid⁹ and yaf to lordis, knyghtis and squyeris for her deserte tounys, vilagis, Castellis and pilis, eche to his proportion for his reward for her grete and longe trauaile.

¹ nowyt where B.

² And then we B.

³ we B.

⁴ hem hye yn all the hast to Bayous B.

⁵ and om. G.

⁶ leyde there to B.

⁷ vp A., G.

⁸ And om. B.

⁹ depepid G.; departyd B.

And thanne oure kynge with his hoste come doune to a cite that me callid Cessy,¹ that had a ryall and a stronge Mynstir with ynne hym²: but thay yold hem anon to the kynge withoute eny sawte or stryfe or stroke smeton, with many othir castellis and pilis riall that longid to that cite of Cessy,³ that to hit weren compownyd.⁴

And thanne oure kynge, as it lay in his way, come forth to launson,⁵ and wanne the Brygge and the toune, and toke there many prysoneris, and grete plente of tresoure there the kynge wanne. And fro thens the kynge sent the Erle⁶ of Warwik to a toune that me callid Belham,⁷ with othir moo lordis and knyghtis, men of armys and archeris, and with stuffe of Gounys and othir ordynauncis.

And whanne they sawe and spied⁸ the englishe menys ordynauncis, thanne for drede thei tretid and yold hem and put hem holely in the kyngis grace and mercy.

And thanne tretid othir dyuerse tounys and strengthis, as Bayes and Mortriual,⁹ that weren wallid tounys bothe, and meny stutte¹⁰ and stronge Castellis that weren aboute hem yold hem vp to oure kynge that same tyme and besoughte hym of grace and of mercy, and to become hys liege pepull and at alle tymes redy to¹¹ the kynges comaundement.

And thanne dyuerse lordis of the kyngys hoste, with her pepull of men of armys and archeris, bisegid the toune of Vernull: and thei yold it vp to the kynge bothe toune and Castell, bothe bodyes and goodes to the kynges will and comaundemente: and so the kynge gate and conquerid alle the tounys, vilagis smale and grete, and alle the abbeyis of deffence, castellis and pilis, yeuen to the cite of Rone.

¹²And in the¹³ same yere on seint petur is day and poule in the monythe of Juyn the erle of huntynghdon, with othir lordis and all her retenewe of men of armys and archeris, foughten with ix Carrikkis of Gene, the grettiste that myght ben sene in the costis of normandye: and there thei scomfitid hem, and of whom, thonkyd be god, thei toke iiij grete carrikkis and her patronys, and alle her stuffe, man and good, and her chieff amyrell of hem that was callid the bastard of Burbone, with alle the Tresoure that thei shuld haue had for wagis of a quarter of a yere: and the othir carrikkis fledden her¹⁴ wey and durste not abyde.

¹ Seez; Crescy G.

² ham B.

³ Cresci G.

⁴ compounded B.

⁵ Alençon.

⁶ Duke G.

⁷ Belleme.

⁸ aspyd A.; say and aspyd B.

⁹ Mortriuale A.; luyes and Mortyvale B.

¹⁰ stowte A.; stovte B.

¹¹ at B.

¹² B. omits the next two paragraphs; W. inserts them together with Burgundy's murder at the end after the notice of Oldcastle.

¹³ Also in this A.

¹⁴ he G.

And in the V. yere of kynge henri is regne,¹ thankid be god, the grete generall counseile was endid, and an vnyon made in holy chirche thorough all cristiante, and a pope chosyn by alle the hole clergie: and at Constaunce vpon seint Martynys day Bisshop and confessoure, and by comen assente of alle the clergie that there weren generall in that tyme,² callid hym MARTINUS QUINTUS.

And also in the same yere the dolfyn of ffraunce sent aftur the duke of Burgoyne, to whom as men seyne not ffully viij³ dayis aforne he was sworn on goddis body sacrid to ben good and trewe togederis, and for to come and speke with hym bysidis paris at the Toune of Mostreux with serteyne personys vndir the dolfynys sauf condite.

And whanne he was come thedur, nat withstondynge his sauf condite and his grete othe made, that was betwene hem bothe, the Viscounte of⁴ nerbone, as the duke knelid before the dolfyn in a Chambre, he smote hym with an axe on the hede: and so the fals dolfyn and his complices falsly and vntrewly, and ayens all maner lawe of armys murtherid the foreseid duke, and made there an ende of hym.

And also in the same⁵ yere of kynge henrys Regne the V. sir John Oldcastell, knyght, that was callid the lord Cobham, was arestid for lollerye,⁶ and commyttid to the toure of london: and anon aftur he brake oute of the toure, and moo othir prisoneris, and ascapid and fled into Walis⁷: and there he kept hym a longe tyme.

And at the last the lorde powis and his meyne met with sir John oldcastelle in the contre of Walis, and wold haue arestid hym on the kyngis by halff as for a rebell and a traytour to the kynge and to the Rewme: and right⁸ myghtily he faught a grete while, and was sore woundid and ouyrcome: and so he was take⁹ there and arestid by the lord powis and his meyne, and brought out of Walis into engelond, and so to london in a Whirlecole, and so in the same whirlecole brought to Westem'. hall to the parlement, and byform the kyngis Justicis.

And there he was examynynd and araynyd of the poyntis that weren put on hym, and there he was tho conuicte in treson, and there

¹ henreis Regne þe V^o A.

² clergie þat were þere at þat tyme W.

³ vij A., W.

⁴ Viscounte and G.

⁵ And in the V^{te} B.

⁶ arested afore Bollerye B.

⁷ The error, through which Oldcastle's first arrest and escape from the Tower appears under the fifth year, occurs in all the English versions, and also in the shorter Latin Version (see p. 318 below).

⁸ and so B.

⁹ and taken B.; W., which followed the Version of 1419 to this point, now changes to that of 1430.

dampnyd to the dethe: and so he was brought ayen¹ fro Westem'. to the toure of london, and there leid on an hurdill and drawe thorough the Cite to seynt Gylis feld² withoute holburne: and there was made a newe peyre of³ Galouys for hym: and there he was hongid and brent galouys and all: and this was his ende here in this worlde.

¹ brougt w^t men B.

² Gylees in the ffelde B.

³ of om. A., B.

V. THE LATIN BRUT

The Latin Brut ends with the murder of James I of Scotland in 1437, though in some copies independent continuations to various dates have been added. The manuscripts (I have examined nine¹ only, but it is not likely that others vary greatly) fall into two main classes according as they give a brief or a full account of the reign of Henry V. For the reigns of Henry IV and Henry VI all are very similar; though they have frequent textual variations, which may be due in part to independent translations from the English original.

(1) Manuscripts with a brief account of the reign of Henry V.

1. Rawlinson C. 398, ff. 48-51, in the Bodleian Library. An excellent MS. written not long after 1437. For the campaign of Agincourt it agrees with the copies of the second class. It belonged to the famous Sir John Fortescue (see Mr. Plummer's edition of The Governance of England, pp. 180, 181).

2. Cotton Domitian A. iv, ff. 53-7, in the British Museum. Written about the middle of the fifteenth century.

3. Harley 3906, ff. 101-11, in the British Museum, with a continuation to 1456—the Sherborne Annals, printed on pp. 347-49 below. Written about 1456.

4. Arundel 5, ff. 162-6, at the College of Arms, with a continuation to 1471—from 1422 onwards it is printed in Dr. Gairdner's Three Fifteenth Century Chronicles, pp. 164-85, as A Brief Latin Chronicle. Written about 1471. The MS. belonged to John Foxe, the Martyrologist, and afterwards to Lord William Howard.

5. Rawlinson B. 195 in the Bodleian Library. A sixteenth-century copy.

(2) Manuscripts with a full account of the reign of Henry V.

1. Lansdowne 212, ff. 153-71, in the British Museum. A somewhat late copy. It has some noteworthy variations for the reigns of Henry IV and Henry VI. On f. 1 is the note 'Liber Monasterii Glastonensis e bibliotheca Guilielmi Camdeni, Clarenceux'; this is confirmed (or perhaps explained) by the interpolation on f. 27 of a notice of St. Joseph of Arimathea and his coming 'in Insula Auallonie que nunc Glastonia dicitur'.

2. St. John's College, Oxford, 78. An early copy very little later than 1437.

3. Rawlinson B. 169 in the Bodleian Library. Written about the middle of the fifteenth century. For the reign of Henry IV it does not differ materially from Rawlinson C. 398; for the reign of Henry VI it is somewhat abbreviated.

4. Harley 3884 in the British Museum. Only for 1415 to 1437, with a continuation for 1445 to 1455. Written between 1456 and 1460. In this MS. the Chronicle comes at the end of a copy of Higden's Polychronicon. For a further description of the MS. and its contents see pp. 342 below.

¹ Not counting the Godstow Chronicle, or Rawlinson B. 147.

In addition to these MSS. there is the so-called Godstow Chronicle, ap. Hearne's edition of Roper's Life of More, pp. 238-46. Hearne explains that he only gave it its name 'quia in illud forte fortuna inciderim quum anno Mdccxv una cum J. Bagford ad rudera prioratus de Godstowe iuxta Oxoniam animi recreandi gratia perambularem'. It is no more than an imperfect copy of the Latin Brut. Both the beginning and conclusion have been lost. It ends in the middle of the account of the battle of Verneuil. The text closely resembles that of the Domitian MS., except for the interpolation of a notice of the fight at Bramham Moor, and of some verses on Henry V, and for the somewhat fuller and superior narrative of the years 1415 to 1421 (see Hearne, u. s., pp. 240-3). The manuscript is now Rawlinson C. 234 at the Bodleian Library.

In Rawlinson B. 147 (a tiny quarto) there is a peculiar version of the Latin Brut. The history for 1399 to 1437 is contained on ff. 40^{vo}-43^{vo}. For the reign of Henry IV it is very brief; the defeat of Northumberland and Bardolph in 1408 is said to have taken place at 'Hasulwode' (the Godstow Chronicle has 'Bramyng More prope Hasylwode'). For Henry V it is short but has some peculiarities; the Sire de Gaucourt and Dominus de Toteville [Estouteville] appear erroneously amongst the prisoners of Agincourt; there is a reference to the Benedictine Chapter of 1421. The narrative for 1422 to 1430 is superior to that of the ordinary Latin Brut, especially for Verneuil and the Parliament at Leicester; but the matter all comes from the English Brut, or the London Chronicles. The very short account of 1430 to 1436 is abbreviated from the ordinary text. This Chronicle is of interest only as proving the existence of another version.

In Rawlinson C. 398 the Chronicle is attributed to an otherwise unknown Richard Rede, and it has in consequence sometimes been cited as 'Richard Rede's Chronicle'; possibly Rede was no more than the owner or transcriber of that copy. One Richard Rede was Chancellor of the green wax and clerk of the common pleas in Ireland¹; but the name was not an uncommon one. The St. John's College MS. ends: 'vt dicitur, differebat. Shyrburne.' This has led to the ascription of the Chronicle, by a seventeenth-century writer (after 1644) in the Lansdowne MS., to Shyrburne. But Shyrburne was only the scribe or owner of the St. John's College MS., which has at the end of the volume on f. 156 the note: 'Frater Johannes Shyrburne me fecit fieri.' The Latin Brut seems to be the work which Hardyng cites as 'Chronicon Magistri Norham' (see p. 148 above); Norham also was probably only the name of an owner. The Latin Brut must be left as an anonymous work. In any case it is not an original composition, but a mere translation.

A brief note on the earlier part of the Latin Brut down to 1399 may not be out of place. The original work probably ended at the Norman Conquest, and was composed in the fourteenth century, to the latter years of which two manuscripts of this type (Magdalen College, Oxford, 200; and Lambeth, 99) belong.² Different copies seem to present a good deal of textual variation. I have compared L., D., and S. for the reign of Richard II; all three are obviously translated (though with much abbreviation) from the common English text; but L. is fuller than D., and D. is fuller than S.; this is in agreement with their relative character in the subsequent continuations.

The relation of the Latin Brut to the English version preserved in Davies's Chronicle, and of the longer narrative for the reign of Henry V to Tito Livio's Vita Henrici Quinti is discussed on pp. 53 and 127-31 above.

¹ Cal. Pat. Rolls, Henry VI, iv. 419; cf. Letters of Margaret of Anjou, p. 149.

² See Brie, Geschichte und Quellen, pp. 127-30; Cotton Julius B. iii is a fifteenth-century MS. of the same type.

In the footnotes to the text the MSS. are designated as follows:

Rawlinson C. 398	= C.	Lansdowne 212	= L.
Domitian A. iv	= D.	St. John's College 78	= F.
Harley 3906	= S.	Rawlinson B. 169	= B.
Arundel 5	= A.	Harley 3884	= H.

The text of (1) is based on C. collated with D., S., A., L., F., and H. A. for the reigns of Henry IV and Henry V agrees so closely with D. (except in one place, see p. 314 n. 9) that I have only noted it for the reign of Henry VI. D. and S. are generally similar; and so are H., F., and L.; these groups correspond to the two versions. C., as noted above, for the campaign of Agincourt resembles the longer version.

The text of (2) is based on L. collated with F., B., H., and the printed text of Tito Livio's Vita Henrici. B. and F. are similar texts, and resemble the Vita in one or two interesting points, where L. differs; see especially the reference to the Universities on p. 323. H. is for both versions the least useful text.

(1) THE COMMON VERSION FOR 1399 TO 1437

Henricus de Bolyngbroke, Dux Herefordie, Comes Derbeie, et heres¹ Johannis de Gaunt nuper² Ducis Lancastrie,³ post Regem Ricardum depositum de communi assensu procerum et magnatum ac communitatis Regni, in festo⁴ sancti Edwardi Regis et Confessoris apud Westmonasterium coronatur. Iste Henricum,⁵ filium suum seniores et heredem,⁶ fecit Principem Wallie, Ducem Cornubie, ac Comitem Cestrie; et Thomam Arundell, Archiepiscopum Cantuariensem,⁷ in suum restituit Archipresulatum: Rogerum vero⁸ Walden, quem Rex Ricardus Archiepiscopum Cantuar. fecerat,⁹ in Episcopatum London. tunc vacantem detruxit¹⁰; nec non filium et heredem Comitum Arundellie fecit Comitem Arundell, et in possessionem terrarum suarum restituit.¹¹

Anno primo Regis huius apud Wyndesore in vigilia Epiphanie Domini venit Dux de Awmarle ad Regem, ac ei intimaui qualiter¹² ipse et Dux Surrie,¹³ Dux Exonie, Comes Sarum, Comes Gloucestrie, et alii sui sequaces¹⁴ fuerant concordati, vt in nocte diei Epiphanie quendam ludum, Anglice a Mommynge Regi facerent, et in eodem

¹ filius F. ² dudum F. ³ ducis Lancastrie defuncti D., F., L.

⁴ magnatum in festo F.; magnatum Anglie ac communitatis Regni in festo L.; Gaunt de communi omnium assensu in festo S.

⁵ Rex iste Henricus filium F.; Rex iste anno primi regni sui fecit Henricum L.; Iste Henricus Henricum, S.

⁶ et heredem om. S. ⁷ Archiepiscopum Cantuariensem om. S.

⁸ ac Rogerum D., S. ⁹ Archiepiscopum ordinauerat S.

¹⁰ transtulit F., L.; instituit S.; Cantuar. ordinauerat, expellebat et ad episcopatum London. tunc vacantem promouebat D.

¹¹ in possessionem suam restituit F.; ad suam hereditatem restituit, L.; necnon . . . restituit om. S.

¹² Dux Albemarle intimaui Regi L.

¹³ Epiphanie intimatum erat Regi qualiter Dux Surrie S.; intimatum illi quomodo F.

¹⁴ complices F.

ipsum interficere intentabant.¹ Qua nocte Rex secrete venit London. acquirere sibi auxilium² contra suos proditores.³ Sed cognito quod eorum prodicio fuerat Regi intimata, festine aufugerunt.⁴ Dux Surreie et Comes Sarum cum tota eorum familia ad villam de Circestre fugerunt, vbi communitas⁵ dicte ville ipsos arestare voluisset; sed ipsi obedire nolentes pugnaverunt contra ipsos, sed capti sunt et deuicti, et alii plures cum eis, et ibidem decollantur.⁶

Postmodum vero apud Pritwelle in Essex in quodam molendino Johannes Holand, Dux Exonie, per communitatem illius patrie capitur, et vsque Plasshe deductus decapitatus est.⁷ Comes Gloucestrie apud Bristoliam capitur, et in foro ibidem capite priuatus est.⁸ Hoc eodem anno Bernardus Brokes, Johannes Shelley, milites, Johannes Mawdeleyn, et Willelmus Fereby, nuper capellani Regis Ricardi, capiuntur, qui postmodum decapitati fuerunt.⁹

Hoc anno Isabella Regina, nuper vxor Regis Ricardi, dote sua nudata, cum magnis tamen muneribus, ab Anglia pulsa est, et in Franciam transmissa.

Anno secundo Regis huius Rogerus Claryngdon, miles, et Prior de Anno ij. Launde¹⁰ ac octo fratres minores,¹¹ et alii duo seruientes dicti militis, tracti et suspensi fuerunt.¹² Hoc anno¹³ incepit discordia inter dominum Grey de Ruthyn et Owinum de Glendore in¹⁴ Wallia. Hoc eciam anno quarterium frumenti vendebatur ad sexdecim solidos.¹⁵

¹ intendebant ℥; Regem occidere proponebant D., S.

² sibi acquirere supportamen D.

³ Qua nocte . . . proditores om. S.; contra suos proditores om. D.; Rex timens eorum prodicionem clam adiuit London. ℥, so also L. but reading ipsorum potenciam.

⁴ quod hoc fuerat Regi intimatum, predicti proceres cum omni festinatione aufugerunt D.; prodicio esset diuulgata protinus ad diuersa loca dispersi sunt ℥.

⁵ populus D.

⁶ Set ipsi huic obedire noluerunt, set contra populum fortiter dimicarunt, quibus tandem per ipsum populum debellatis, capti sunt et alii plures cum eis et pariter decollantur D.; voluisset, restiterunt fortiter dimicantes, ipsis tamen debellatis et captis cum pluribus aliis decollati sunt ℥; dimicantes, set tandem debellati et capti, ibidem decapitati sunt L.

⁷ Et cognito hoc Regi erat intimatum, predicti proceres cum omni festinatione protinus confugerunt. Quorum Dux Surreie et Comes Sarum apud Cicestr. decollati sunt, Johannes Holond, Dux Exonie, in quodam molendino apud Pruttwell in Essex, et vsque Plasch' deducitur et decollatur S.

⁸ capite est truncatus D.; capite truncatur L.

⁹ postea decollantur D.; capiuntur et decapitantur L.; Hoc eodem . . . fuerunt om. ℥.

¹⁰ Launde iuxta Leycestriam ℥. ¹¹ fratres minores ordinis sancti Francisci D.

¹² Comes Gloucestrie . . . fuerunt om. S.; minores, quorum quidam erant magistri in theologia, et alii tracti et suspensi sunt L. Cf. Davies's Chron. p. 24, where one of the friars is called a maister of diuinite. See also Eulogium Historiarum, iii. 391, 392.

¹³ Anno ij^o huius Regis S.

¹⁴ Glendore armigerum de L.

¹⁵ Hoc eciam . . . solidos om. ℥, L., S.; Et hoc eciam anno erat caristia frumenti, quarterium enim frumenti erat precii xvj. s. D.

Anno iij^o Anno tercio apparuit stella comata, et nocte beate Marie Magdalene proximo sequenti commissum est graue bellum apud Salopiam inter istum Regem Henricum et dominum Henricum Percy, filium Comitis Northumbrie, et hoc falso consilio et iniqua suggestionem domini Thome Percy auunculi sui, Comitis Wigornie; vbi prefatus dominus Henricus Percy, Comes Staffordie, et alii quamplurimi sunt occisi ex vtraque parte ad numerum mille quadringentorum et sexdecim hominum.¹ Et dominus Thomas Percy captus ibidem, postea tractus, suspensus et decollatus est. De isto bello metricus quidam sic dicit:—

Anno milleno quater et centesimo bino

Bellum Salopie fuit in Mag. nocte Marie.²

Anno iij^{to} Anno quarto Regis huius venit Imperator Constantinopolitanus cum multis aliis proceribus³ in Angliam, Quo etiam anno Domina Johanna, Ducissa Britannie, venit in Angliam quam Rex iste Henricus apud Wintoniam in Abbathia sancti Swithini desponsauit.⁴ Et eodem anno Domina Blanchea, primogenita huius Regis,⁵ nupsit filio Ducis de Barre⁶ apud Coloniam, presentibus ibidem Ricardo Clifforde, Episcopo Wigorniensis, qui nupcias celebravit, et Comite Somersetie, qui post nupciarum solemnitate Angliam reuersi sunt.⁷

Anno vij^{to} Anno sexto Ricardus Scroop, Archiepiscopus Eboracensis, et Dominus de Mowbray, qui et Comes Marescallus dictus erat, ob prodicionem in eis impositam,⁸ apud Ebor. decollantur; per quem Archiepiscopum deus omnipotens vsque in hodiernam diem plura miracula operatus est.⁹

Anno vij^{mo} Anno septimo Domina Lucia, soror Ducis Mediolanensis, in Angliam

¹ occisi ad numerum iij M. ccccxvj. hominum D., L.; ad summam MMM. ccccxvj. S.

² Et dominus Thomas . . . Marie, om. S.

³ cum . . . proceribus om. L., S.; cum pluribus illius patrie proceribus ℥.

⁴ Quo anno Rex desponsauit Johannam, ducissam Britanniam, Winton in monasterio sancti Swithini S.

⁵ senior filia Regis D., ℥., L., S.

⁶ Bauarre ℥.

⁷ post nupcias celebratas in Angliam redierunt D.; Coloniam, quorum nupcias Ricardus Clifford, episcopus Wigorniensis, tunc celebravit, presente Comite Somersetie, &c. ℥.; Regis, per Ricardum Clifford, Episcopum Wigornensem, et Comitem Somerset vsque Coloniam adducta filio ducis Bauarre ibidem desponsata est L.; presentibus . . . reuersi sunt, om. S.

⁸ ob . . . impositam om. D.

⁹ plurima signa et mirabilia operantur D.; dictus, apud Ebor. decollantur. Deus enim omnipotens per ipsum Archiepiscopum vsque hodie multa mirabilia operatur ℥.; dictus erat, ac Willelmus Plumpton, miles, apud Ebor. decollantur. Deus enim omnipotens, &c. L. A. adds after operatus est: Willelmo Gascoigne, principali iusticiario, recusante ipsum Ricardum indicare, Willelmus Fulthorp, miles, adiudicauit eum morti. Restitit auro predictus Archiepiscopus Regi propter multas exactiones quas idem Rex omni anno exegit de ecclesia et regno suo ad sustentandum guerras suas, et non obstante quod idem Rex prius iurauerat primo anno coronacionis sue ipse nunquam in tempore suo exigeret taxas et tallagia a regno suo. There then follow (ff. 163-5) the Articles put forth by Scrope and Mowbray.

veniebat, et Domino Edmundo Holond, Comiti Kancie,¹ matrimonialiter copulatur. Hoc anno obiit ille nobilis et famosus miles Robertus Knollis, et in ecclesia fratrum Carmelitarum London. sepelitur.² Eodem anno Domina Philippa, iunior filia dicti Regis, per Dominum Ricardum, fratrem Ducis Ebor.,³ et Edmundum Courteneye, Episcopum Wigorniensem, et plures alios vsque Daciam deducta est, quam Rex Dacie suscepit in vxorem.⁴

Anno octauo Henricus, Comes Northumbrie, et Dominus de Bardolf Anno viij^o a Scocia venerunt in Angliam in preiudicium et destruccionem Regis, qui capti sunt et⁵ iuxta Eboracum decollantur.

Anno ix^o Edmundus Holond, Comes Kancie, factus est admirallus Anno ix^{mo} Anglie, qui cum multitudo nauium in partibus Britannie, videlicet in Insula de Briak, applicuit et Castellum obsedit, vbi in capite percussus cum quarello occubuit.⁶ Hoc anno fuit magnum gelu in Anglia, et durauit per quindecim septimanas.⁷

Anno terciodecimo moritur Johannes Beaufort,⁸ Comes Somersetie Anno xij^o et Capitaneus Calesie. Hoc eciam anno⁹ Dux Burgundie misit ambassiatores in Angliam ad Regem, supplicans et postulans auxilium contra Ducem Aurelianensem. Rex vero misit Comitem de Arundell, Gilbertum Vmfravile, Comitem de Kyme, Dominum de Cobham, et Johannem Oldecastell,¹⁰ et alios cum magna potestate ad dictum Ducem Burgundie in Franciam; et apud Senclowe¹¹ iuxta Parisius contra dictum Ducem Aurelianensem victoriam obtinuerunt.¹²

Anno quartodecimo Rex iste infirmitate insanabili arreptus vicesimo die Marcii apud Westmonasterium spiritum exalauit, et in ecclesia Christi Cantuarie honorifice tumulatur.¹³

¹ Kancie apud [ecclesiam] sancte Marie ouerie in Southwerk D.

² Anno septimo . . . sepelitur om. J., S. ³ Ricardum, Ducem Ebor. S.

⁴ et Regi Dacie maritatur S. ⁵ capti sunt et om. D.

⁶ Anglie, in obsidione castri de Bryak cum quarello percussus in capite occubuit L.

⁷ Anno octauo . . . septimanas om. J., S.; Hoc anno fuit . . . septimanas om. L.

⁸ John Beaufort died on 16th March, 1410, in the eleventh year.

⁹ Really in 1411.

¹⁰ et Johannem Oldcastell, dominum de Cobham D. ¹¹ St. Cloud.

¹² cum potestate magna, qui apud Senclowe iuxta Parisius ducem Aurelianensem debellauerunt J., L.

¹³ For this paragraph D. reads: Et hoc anno dominus Rex fecit Thomam filium suum Ducem Clarencie, et Johannem alium filium suum minorem Ducem Bedfordie. Rex iste cum xij annis et quasi dimidio regnasset apud Westm. spiritum exalauit, et in ecclesia Christi Cantuar. sepelitur.

J. has simply: Et cum Rex iste regnasset xij annos et dimidium apud Westm. spiritum exalauit &c., as in D.

L. has: Duxerat autem Rex iste dum Comes Derbeie erat filiam Comitisse Herefordie, de qua genuit Henricum, qui post eum regnauit, Thomam Ducem Clarencie, Johannem Ducem Bedfordie, et Humfridum Ducem Gloucestrie, et duas filias, Blancheam nuptam filio Ducis Bauarre, et Philippam nuptam Regi Dacie.

Henricus quintus, filius Henrici iij^{ti}, Princeps Wallie, Dux Cornubie et Comes Cestrie, apud Monemouth in Wallia natus, vicesimo die Marcii, videlicet¹ in festo sancti Cuthberti, episcopi et Confessoris, accidente tamen Dominica in Passione domini apud Westmonasterium coronatur.²

Anno primo huius Regis insurrexerunt plurimi Lollardi, ipsum Regem et clerum sui Regni occidere et destruere proponentes, sed diuino mediante auxilio infra breue penitus sunt extincti.

Anno tercio huius Regis Comes Cantebrigie, frater Ducis Ebor., Dominus le Scroop, Thesaurarius Anglie, et Thomas Grey, miles, ipsum Regem Francigenis pro vno millione auri vendiderunt, ac ipsum et fratres suos interficere subito proposuerunt. Qui propterea capti et morti adiudicati apud Suthhamptoniam capitibus sunt truncati. Quo facto mox Rex ille, cum multitudine nauium ad numerum mille et quingentarum et potestate magna, versus Harefieu in Normanniam nauigauit, et apud Kitcaws applicuit, ac villam de Harefieu³ obsedit, diris insultibus ipsam infestando.⁴ Cuius parietes horribilibus bumbar-dorum iaculacionibus pilas lapideas terribiliter euomencium solo tenus consternuntur, turres, campanilia, forcia, et edificia violenter conqua-ciendo. Talium pilarum ludus nusquam a seculo est visus vel auditus in confiniis Francorum.⁵ Propterea laceratis meniis, qui infra villam fuerunt pauore concussi ac de rescussu⁶ penitus desperati, villam Regi reddiderunt. Cui Rex auunculum suum, Thomam Beaufort, tunc Et cum regnasset annis xij et dimidio apud Westm. spiritum exalauit, et in ecclesia Christi Cantuar. honorifice sepelitur.

For the last two paragraphs S. reads: A^o xij^o huius Regis Rex Henricus fecit Thomam filium suum Ducem Clarencie, Johannem alium filium suum Ducem Bedfordie, et Humfredum filium suum iuniorem Ducem Glouc.; et cum regnasset &c., as in D.

¹ Princeps . . . videlicet om. S.

² March 20th was the date of Henry's accession. He was crowned on April 9th—Passion Sunday.

³ villam de Harfiew cum castro obsidiauit et obtinuit. Deinde vero remeauit ad locum qui dicitur Agincourt, vbi francigenas fortiter debellauit, et gloriose deuicit. Vbi xj milia Francorum fuerunt interempti ex captiuis. In quo bello de Francigenis predictis centum viginti milia fuerunt numerata, et de Anglicis septem milia. Vbi etiam occisi sunt de francigenis Dux de Barre &c. D.

Et villam cum castro de Hareflete in vigilia Assumpcionis beate Marie et in die sancti Mauricii viriliter obtinuit. Deinde cumctis ibi dispositis reuersus est Angliam, sed in redeundo per Picardiam venit ad locum qui vocatur Agincourt, vbi francigenas fortiter debellauit. In quo bello de francigenis fuerant numerati centum xx M. virorum, de quibus xj M. interempti fuerunt, exceptis capitaneis. Deinde Angligenis vero in toto fuerunt ix milia. Capitanei occisi ex parte Francorum Dux de Barre &c. S.

⁴ This text as far as ad transactum diei medium on p. 317 resembles the longer version, see pp. 325, 326; D. and S. have only the brief notices given in Note 3.

⁵ Talium . . . Francorum om. L. and other copies of longer version.

⁶ Anglice rescue; subsidio L.

Comitem Dorsetie, expulsis Francigenis intromissaque omni ordinacione sua bellica in eandem, prefecit Capitaneum et Rectorem. Duravit autem obsidio ista a decimo septimo die Augusti vsque vicesimum secundum diem Septembris proximum sequentem.

Rex vero abinde versus Calesiam per Aquam de Somme voluit arripere, sed fractis pontibus ibidem per aquam de Swerdes tunc iter suum carpere necessario oportebat; vbi exercitus centum milium gallorum, vt ipsum cum suo exercitu inopinate interriperet, viam sibi precludebat. Quo comperto Rex cum parua manu Anglorum non plene octo milium virorum pugnancium suas, vt potuit, direxit attente acies ad prelium, Ducem Ebor., ipso id instancius postulante, prime preferens aciei. Eius vtique sagaci ingenio tunc actum est vt Anglici palos bisacutos ante se in terra haberent defixos, ne ab equitibus Francorum conculcarentur; quod multum valuit nostris Angligenis in die illa.

Interea Rex et ceteri Angligene priusquam inirent certamen terram flexis genibus trina vice deosculati sunt. Tuncque conueniunt acies in campo qui dicitur Agincourt, die scilicet veneris in festo Crispini et Crispiniani; cedes fit maxima, et ex crebris et continuis ictibus sagittarum ruunt vtrobique Francorum morientium corpora, bellum committitur atrocissimum, pugnatum est autem ab hora prima mane vsque post transactum diei medium.¹

Taliter enim decertabant Angli quod auxiliante altissimo cessit illis victoria.

In quo bello interfecti sunt ex parte Francorum Dux de Barre, Dux de Launson² et Dux Brabancia, Archiepiscopus de Saunz,³ Comes Nauernie⁴, et Principalis Constabularius Francie et alii octo Comites, centum Barones ac mille et quingenti milites et nobiles. Nota de numero interfectorum in bello de Agincourt.

Capti sunt eciam ex parte Francorum Dux Aurelianensis et Dux Burbonie, Comes de Vandon,⁵ Comes de Ew, Comes Richemondie,⁶ Bursigaunt⁷ Marescallus Francie, cum aliis plurimis. Illo nempe die emarcuit flos tocius milicie gallicane.⁷ De Anglis vero occisi sunt Dux Ebor., et Comes Suffolchie cum aliis viginti sex. Manus enim Anglorum non erat excelsa, sed Dominus fecit hec omnia.⁸ Delatis igitur tam graciosis rumoribus in Angliam exultat pro tanti triumphi Nota numerum capti-orum.

¹ This paragraph varies a good deal in expression from the longer version, see p. 326 below.

² Alençon.

³ Sens.

⁴ Nevers.

⁵ Vendôme.

⁶ Boucicault.

⁷ Illo . . . gallicane om. D., S.

⁸ Occisi vero sunt de Anglis Dux Ebor., qui oppressus fuit, Comes Southfolchie, cum aliis xxvj. Manus enim Domini fecit hec omnia, cui laus et honor Amen. D. So also S. stopping at hec omnia.

gaudio Anglia tota, et potissime illa nobilis Ciuitas Londoniarum congratulatur, et gracias refert tocius gratie largitori de tanta Regis sui victoria ympnum illum celicum Te Deum laudamus summo opifici a quo hec et cuncta bona se recepisce fatetur, pulsatis campanis, vocibus altissonis, processionaliter ympnizando.

Rex autem, post tam mirum et admirabilem triumphum, vsque ad opidum de Blankesale,¹ vbi nocte diem belli precedente hospitatus fuerat, lentis passibus retrocedens pernoctabat ibidem. Mane vero Sabbati cum exercitu et suis concaptiuis versus Calesiam tendens, prosperis successibus Angliam victoriose repedauit.²

Hoc anno venit imperator³ Alemannie in Angliam, et a Rege honorifice susceptus est.

Anno iiij^{to} Rex iste iterato in Normanniam reuersus est, et apud Towk⁴ applicuit, vbi fecit quadraginta octo milites, et Castellum et villam cito obtinuit. Postea vero obtinuit plurima Castella, villas, abbathias, et municiones quousque veniret ad Ciuitatem Rothomagensem.

Anno quinto Johannes Oldecastell, Dominus de Cobham, captus est et propter Lollardiam in turrin London. positus; qui postea super heresi conuictus et dampnatus, tandem super furcas cum cathena ferrea suspensus combustus est cum aliis sequacibus suis.

Capitanei in obsidione Rothomagi. Anno sexto Rex obsedit dictam villam Rothomagensem, ad quam obsidionem presentes fuerunt cum ipso Rege Dux Clarencie, Dux Gloucestrie, Dux Exonie, Comes Marchie, Comes Huntyngdon, Comes Warwici, Comes Sarum, Comes Suffolchie, Comes de Mortan, Comes de Kyme, et Comes de Ormonde; Baro de Carew, dominus le Roos, dominus Ferrers, dominus Willughby, dominus Fitzhugh, dominus Talbot, dominus de Haryngton, dominus Bergevenny, Nevill,⁵ filius Comitis Westmerlandie, Johannes Cornewaille, Willelmus Porter, Philippus Leche, Ricardus Arundell, milites, et Prior sancti Johannis Jerusalem in Hibernia cum mille quingentis Hibernicis.

Capitanei ex parte Francorum.

Et isti fuerunt capitanei ex parte Francorum in dicta Ciuitate eodem tempore. Mounsyr Guy Botiller, principalis Capitaneus, Mounsyr Termegan, Mounsyr Roche, Mounsyr Antony, Mounsyr de Penneux, Henricus Chamfew, Johannes Matervase, Bastardus de Tyne, et graunt Jakes. Et quilibet horum capitaneorum habuit sub se quinque milia armatorum, et quidam eorum plures.⁶ Et fertur quod in primo aduentu dicti Regis numerati fuerunt in dicta Ciuitate homines, mulieres, ac

¹ It should be Maisonnelles.

³ Sigismundus imperator S.

⁵ Radulfus Nevell D., S.

² Delatis igitur . . . repedauit om. D., S.

⁴ Touques.

⁶ Et isti . . . plures om. S.

paruuli, senes et iuuenes, trescenta milia. Ex quibus ad dictam obsidionem quinquaginta milia fame interierunt. Nam tanta ibidem inualuit fames quod muri, ratones, murelegi, canes et equi ad vsum ciborum care vendebantur; paruuli matrum suggestes vbera, una cum matribus pre nimia inedia mortui in plateis corruerunt.¹ Et durauit ista obsidio a principio mensis Augusti vsque principium mensis Ianuarii, et reddita est Ciuitas cum Castello.² Deinde obtinuit Gisorcium cum Castello, Pountoys cum Castello, villam sancti Dionisii, Pourtemlargum³ cum Castello, Castellum de Galiard, villam de Vernon cum Castello, Castellum Roche, villam de Maunt, villam de Pount Millank cum Castello, Castellum Conflaunz, Castellum Sancti Germani Aleye,⁴ et plurima alia Castella, villas, Abbacias et Municiones.⁵ Rex iste Henricus Katerinam, Karoli Regis Francie filiam, duxerat in vxorem, de qua genuit Henricum sextum, cum qua dabantur eidem Regi in maritadium Ciuitas Parisiensis, Ciuitas Prouincie, Ciuitas de Saunz, Ciuitas de Nogent, Ciuitas de Troys, Ciuitas de Reynes, villa de Lanne, et plures alie; et in Picardia Ciuitas de Amice, Ciuitas de Beaufitz, villa sancti Quintini, villa Sancti Audomari, villa de Abbeville, et plures alie.

Ad obsidionem de Melon presentes: Karolus, Rex Francie, Henricus, Rex Anglie, Iacobus, Rex Scotorum, Regina Francie, Katerina Regina Anglie, Dux Clarencie cum Ducissa, Dux Bedfordie, Dux Exonie, Philippus Dux Burgundie, Dux de Baire,⁶ Princeps de Oreng.

Nota de obsidione
de Milon.

Fuerunt eciam ibidem Comes Marchie, Comes Huntyngdonie, Comes Warwici, Comes Somerssetie, Comes Staffordie, Comes Sarum, Comes Suffolchie, Dominus de Roos, Dominus Grey Codnore, Dominus Fitz-Hugh, Dominus Nevill, Dominus Bowcer, Dominus Cliffordie, Dominus Talbot, Dominus Haryngton, Dominus Wilughby, Dominus Scalys, Dominus FitzWatier, Dominus de la Ware, Dominus Ferrers de Charteley, Dominus Lovell, Dominus Morley, Dominus Bergevenny, Radulphus Cromwelle, Walterus Hungerforde et Johannes Tiptot, Dominus le Scroop, et plures alii.⁷

Anno septimo huius Regis dux Clarencie, quem Rex fecerat locum-tenentem Normannie, eo quod ipse Rex cum Regina transierant in Angliam, a Scotis in vigilia Pasche interfectus est. Nam Dux iste, audito quod turma Scotorum ibidem prope latitabat, precipitanter

Dux Clarencie
occiditur.

¹ Nam tanta . . . corruerunt om. D.

² Nam tanta . . . castello om. S.

³ Pont de l'Arche; Pountlarge D.

⁴ Aleir D.

⁵ The list in S. is shorter.

⁶ Bavorie, in Gesta Henrici Quinti, p. 144.¹

⁷ The list is similar to one in the abbreviation of the Pseudo-Elmhams ap. Gesta Henrici Quinti, pp. 143, 144. D. and S. add here: et ista obsidio durauit per xxvj septimanas et reddita est villa Regi Henrico predicto.

assumptis secum paucis nobilibus licet inuitis, relictisque post se suis architenentibus, impetuose egressus est, non deferens vigilie tante solemnitatis. Quo cum peruenisset, irruente subito in eum Comite de Boghan cum scotis et francigenis, interfectus est. Interfecti sunt etiam ibidem¹ Dominus de Roos, Dominus Gilbertus Vmfravile, Rogerus Veer, frater Comitis Oxon, Johannes Grey, miles,² et Thomas Butvilane, miles, cum aliis. Capti vero sunt ibidem Comes Huntynghdonie, Comes Somersetie,³ Thomas Beaufort,⁴ frater eius, qui postmodum fuit Comes de Perche, Dominus FitzWatier, Willelmus Bowes, miles, et Henricus Inglose, miles cum aliis; et Bastardus Clarencie et alii plures euaserunt.

Hic Rex graciosus, et Princeps vbique victoriosus,⁵ infirmitate graui fatigatus, cum regnasset annis nouem, mensibus quinque, tribus septimanis et tribus diebus, apud⁶ Boscum Vincencii in Francia, vltima die Augusti vite valefecit; qui in Angliam delatus apud Westmonasterium sepelitur.

Henricus sextus, filius predicti⁷ Regis Henrici quinti, apud Wyndesore in festo sancti Nicholai, Episcopi et Confessoris, natus, in etate nouem mensium et quindecim dierum regnare cepit primo die Septembris.⁸ Et die dominica in festo sancti Leonardi, Abbatis, anno domini millesimo quadringentesimo vicesimo nono et anno Regni sui octauo apud Westmonasterium coronatur.⁹ Et anno Regni sui decimo coronatus est in ciuitate Parisiensi nono die Decembris.¹⁰

Anno Regis huius tercio¹¹ commissum est graue prelium¹² inter Johannem Ducem Bedfordie, tunc Regentem Francie, ac Francos et Scotos apud Vernul in Perche; et fuerunt cum dicto Duce Comes Sarum, Comes Suffolchie, Dominus Wilughby, Dominus Scales,

¹ Anno vij dicti Regis in vigilia Pasche non multum ante solis occasum Dux Clarencie prefatus ac locumtenens Normannie apud Rium de Leir, dimisso suo exercitu negligenter post ipsum, et assumptis secum magnatibus et proceribus ac paucis aliis, cum illis gracia videndi solum aduentaret, in quo ipse et sui bellum committerent cum Francigenis et Scotis, qui ibi prope latitabant, ipso penitus ignorante, irruente tunc subito Comite de Boghan cum Scotis, illis nescientibus quod ibidem esset, est occisus. Occisi sunt etiam ibidem D. S. omits this paragraph altogether.

² Johannes Grey, miles, Thomas Marny, miles, Henricus Godard, miles D.

³ Suthfolchie D. incorrectly; Somersetie A.

⁴ So also A., D.; it should be Edmund Beaufort.

⁵ rex gloriosus et vbique victoriosus D., S. ⁶ fatigatus tandem apud D., S.

⁷ inclitissimi H.

⁸ supra dicto ultimo die Augusti A., D., S. Henry V died soon after midnight on the early morning of Sept. 1st; so the date above is the better.

⁹ coronatur, Domino Henrico Wintoniensi episcopo tunc cardinali tituli sancti Eusebii ibidem presente A., D., S.

¹⁰ presente ibidem cardinali supradicto A., D., S. H. and L. give the coronations nearly as above, but in their proper place after the next paragraph.

¹¹ quinto D., S.; A. blank. The true date was 17th Aug., 1424, which was in the second year. Davies's Chron. p. 53 has the same error.

¹² fuit prelium A., D., S. est graue bellum H.

Dominus Ponynges, Willelmus Oldehalle, miles, cum retinencia Ducis Exonie, tunc languentis¹; et in dicto bello ex parte Francorum captus est² Dux de Launson.³ Occisi vero fuerunt ibidem Bastardus de Launson, Comes de Naverne,⁴ ac Comes de Marrebon.⁵ Ex parte vero Scotorum perempti sunt Archibaldus, Comes de Douglas, alias dictus Dux de Toraunce,⁶ Comes de Boghan, Comes de Marre, Comes de Murreye, Jacobus de Dowglas, filius dicti Ducis,⁷ Alexander Lyndesay, miles, Willelmus Dowglas de Donlanrik,⁸ miles,⁹ Matheus Porke, miles, Hugo Erth,¹⁰ miles, et alii quamplures,¹¹ tam de Francis quam de Scotis,¹² ad numerum septem millium et ultra. Postea in foueis dicte ville inuenta sunt, vt dicebatur, quattuor milia submersa.¹³

Anno xiiij^{mo} Regis huius, Philippus, Dux Burgundie, violato iuramento Regi Henrico quinto dudum prestitio,¹⁴ tanquam periurus et perfidus, cum exercitu centum quinquaginta milium virorum, ac alia ordinancia¹⁵, obsedit villam Calesie.¹⁶ Pro qua obsidione dissoluenda missus est¹⁷ Humfridus, Dux Gloucestrie, cum multis nobilibus ac exercitu copioso ad numerum pene sexaginta milium virorum. Sed ante ipsum premissi erant¹⁸ Comes de Morteyn et Dominus Camoys cum quingentis hominibus ad ville predictae prouidam tuicionem, qui multos ibidem interficientes obsidionem infra paucos dies viriliter diffregerunt. Nam Dux Burgundie, audiens Ducem Gloucestrie cum tanto cetu Anglorum concite aduenturum, relinquens post se tentoria sua vecorditer cum suis aufugit.¹⁹

¹ infirmi A., D., S.

² prelium apud Vernul in Perche in Normannia inter Johannem Ducem Bedfordie, auunculum suum, tunc Regentem Francie ac Francos et Scotos. Quo in bello capti sunt ex parte Francorum L.; so also H. very nearly.

³ Alençon.

⁴ Nevers.

⁵ Vicomte de Narbonne.

⁶ Touraine; alius Toraunce om. A.; Thoirine S.

⁷ Comitibus A.

⁸ Drumlanrig; Danlanryk A.

⁹ Willelmus miles om. D., S.

¹⁰ Orth A.; Hugo Erth om. S.

¹¹ Comes de Murreie et alii nobiles quamplurimi H., L.

¹² Scotis in ipso bello et fuga A.

¹³ A. adds:—Et super his omnibus semper Deo gratias.

¹⁴ contra iusurandum suum Regi dudum Henrico Quinto prestitum Ƴ., L.; contra fidelitatis sue iusurandum regi Henrico dudum prestitum H.

¹⁵ ordinancia pregrandi H.

¹⁶ Burgundie, contra fidelitatem suam, villam Calisie obsidiavit cum magno apparatu et multitudine populi copiosa; fuerunt enim ibi, secundum estimationem, plus quam C. milia virorum. In tentoriis et pavilionibus x M., in magnis gunnis xxvij, in cressetibus ardentibus in nocte vij M., in gallis vij M., in parvis gunnis vocatis ribaldis vij M., in crosbowes x M., in carectis xij M. A.

Burgundie falsus et fidefragus villam Calisie obsidiavit cum apparatu et multitudine populi copiosis D. ending nearly as in A.; S. is very similar.

¹⁷ dissoluenda transfretavit A.; soluenda venit D., S.

¹⁸ Gloucestrie, cum turba militum copiosa. Ante cuius transitum premissi sunt L.; so also H., Ƴ. but reading turba plebis.

¹⁹ cum quam pluribus magnatibus et proceribus ac multitudine populi ad

Postmodum vero Dux Gloucestrie Calesiam veniens transiit in Flandriam, villas quasdam comburendo : vbi modicum laudis adquirens, post vndecim dierum spacium in Angliam remeavit.¹

Anno vero eodem infra mensem proximo sequentem quo prefatus Dux Burgundie villam Calesie, vt prefertur,² obsedisset, et ab inde turpiter³ profugatus fuisset, Jacobus, Rex Scotorum, periurus, Castro de Rokesborgh⁴ cum exercitu suo, videlicet centum quadraginta milibus⁵ armatorum, obsidionem apposuit⁶; vbi nichil profecit.⁷ Nam Radulphus Grey, miles, tunc capitaneus dicti Castri, cum quater viginti armatis viris dictum Castrum fortiter custodiens eidem Regi et suo exercitui viriliter resistebat.⁸ Ac cum Regi innotuit de aduentu Archiepiscopi Ebor., Episcopi Dunelmensis, ac Comitis Northumbrie cum magna potencia borialium, Rex et omnis exercitus Scotorum diffugerunt.⁹

numerus lx.M., Calisiam vsque properans. Sed ante ipsum aduentum, Comes de Morten et Dominus de Cammysh cum suis ad numerum ijm.di., dictam villam Calisie tutissime conservantes illam obsidionem infra paucos dies viriliter confregerunt et plurimos ibidem occiderunt. Qui quidem Dux Burgundie cum suis, cognito quod Dux Gloucestrie cum tanta potestate Anglorum in proximo adven- taret, veritus et confusus celerrime capit fugam A. D. and S. are very similar but read: multitudine populi ad numerum lx.M. vsque ad Cant., et deinde vsque ad Calisiam properabant. obsidionem illam viriliter diffregerunt. Burgundie vero Dux, audito celeri aduentu Ducis Gloucestrie cum tanto cetu Anglorum relictis tentoriis ac omni ordinacione sua, in fugam conuersus X., L.; H. is very similar but omits ac omni ordinacione sua.

¹ Postea vero quam predictus dux Gloucestrie Caliam venisset, exinde in Picardiam et Flandriam per dies xj procedendo villas combussit. Ubi etiam Comes Huntingdon et sui villam de Popering cremaverunt ac plurimos peremerunt, et circiter festum sancti Bartholomei Apostoli proximo sequens Dux Gloucestrie memoratus ac magnates cum proceribus et populo suo in Angliam prospere remearunt. A.

Postea vero predictus Dux Glouc. venit Calesiam, et sic in Picardiam et Flandriam per dies xj procedendo villas combussit: vbi Comes Huntyngdonie et sui villam de Popering spoliauerunt et eciam concremaverunt ac plurimos peremerunt. Et circa festum Sancti Bartholomei Apostoli proximo sequens Dux Glouc. ac magnates cum populo suo in Angliam prospere remearunt. D. S. resembles D. except in reading:—procedendo, villas et castra comburendo, tandem villam de Popering concremaverunt et plurimos occiderunt; and in omitting prospere before remeavit.

Dux quidem Gloucestrie Calesiam vsque perueniens, in Flandriamque progressus villas quasdam incendit, post vndecim dierum spacium in Angliam prospere remeando L. So also H. but ending remeanit; and X. but reading veniens, and progressus est incendiendo et interficiendo ac post.

² Caliter A. ³ et inde gratia Dei A.

⁴ Rokesburgh in Northumbria A., D., S.

⁵ cM. et vltra A.; cxl.M. D.; centum quinquaginta milibus H.; clx.M., S.

⁶ appositus S.

⁷ set nichil inde profecit S.

⁸ Nam prenobilis ille miles Radulphus Grey, cum lxxx viris strennis, dictum castrum fortiter custodiuit, et dicto Regi Scotorum et exercitui suo viriliter restitit. A. D. and S. differ from A. on small points. L. reads: castrum illud contra Regem Scocie et omnem exercitum suum viriliter defensabat. So very nearly H.

⁹ Audito autem quod Archiepiscopus Eboracensis, Episcopus Dunelmensis, ac Comes Northumbrie cum magna potestate borialium eisdem obuiare infra breue

Et circa mensem Marcii extunc proximo sequentem idem Rex iniqua suasionem Comitis de Athel, auunculi sui et aliorum sibi in hoc fauencium, per quendam scotum, Willelmum Grame vulgariter nuncupatum,¹ et quosdam alios nocte quadam, dum Rex se ad lectum disponebat camisia et femoralibus² solummodo indutus, ipso Willelmo cum suis complicitibus in ipsum subito irruentibus cum spatibus, crudeliter interfectus est.³ Fertur enim habuisse in corpore suo triginta circiter vulnera, quorum septem letalia videbantur. In cuius rei evidenciam quidam legatus Apostolicus in Scotia tunc existens dictam camisiam postmodum Domino Pape, ut dicitur, deferebat.⁴

(2) THE LONGER VERSION FOR THE REIGN OF HENRY V

Henricus quintus, filius Henrici iiiith, Princeps Wallie, Dux Cornubie et Comes Cestrie, natus apud Monemouth in Wallia, apud Westm. coronatur xx die Marcii,⁵ videlicet in festo Sancti Cutberti episcopi, accidente dominica in passione domini, anno domini millesimo cccc^{mo} xiiij. Hic inter prima sua opera edificauit binas edes, vnam super Tamisie flumen Cartusiensibus viris religiosis, quam Bethleem nominauit, alteram beate Brigide sacris mulieribus, que Sion nominata est. Et hiis ambabus a summo Pontifice indulgencias impetrauit, et prouentibus pluribus dotaui.⁶

Inde omnibus in Hibernia, Scotia ac Wallia satis pacatis, statuit Regnum suum Francie, quod hereditarie sibi deuoluebatur, recuperare. Prius tamen per omnia fere studia et sapientum vniuersitates a viris⁷ proponabant, Rex prefatus et suus exercitus territi et confusi protinus aufugerunt A. D. and S. omit infra breue, and read Ille Rex et eius exercitus.

Rex tandem Scocie, audito rumore de aduentu Comitis Northumbrie et aliorum cum magna potestate, relicta obsidione in Scociam reuersus est, L., and so also with slight variations H. and J.

¹ nominatum A.; Grame, nuncupatum nomine S. ² braceis A.

³ indutus, improvise territus et in cloacam proprie camere fugatus, cum spatibus crudeliter et inhumane est occisus. A. So D. and S., but reading: improvisus, profugatus, and est crudeliter occisus. disponeret, toto nudatus corpore exceptis camisia et femoralibus, ac pre timore in cloacam quandam fugiens multis confossus vulneribus crudeliter occisus est L. se displicaret Rex ad lectum camisia et femoralibus solummodo indutus, ac pre timore tumultancium proditorum in quandam cloacam diffugiens multis confossus vulneribus crudeliter occisus est. J. So also H. as far as cloacam, but reading traditorum; H. ends fugiens, &c., as L.

⁴ differebat, B., H., J.; evidenciam camisia eius postmodum domino Pape differebatur, S.; In cuius deferebat, om. L. A. adds: Benedictus sit Dominus Deus qui tam sepius serulos suos eripuit de manibus querencium eis mala, periurosque et pacem turbantes confudit et evertit.

⁵ 20th March was the date of Henry's accession; he was crowned on Passion Sunday, 9th April.

⁶ Hic dotaui, adopted by Livius, p. 5, with small verbal variations. Livius uses this Chronicle too.

⁷ Prius tamen a viris L.

tam diuini quam humani iuris peritioribus voluit instrui vtrum¹ sine ullo onere consciencie Regnum suum Francie armis repetere posset; quod ita fieri posse² omnes in vnum conuenerunt.³ Tunc legacionem ad Gallos mittit, qui iura sua in consilio Gallorum petant, et si forte negarent nuncient illis Henricum Regem vi et armis sibi iusticiam quesiturum. Qui quidem legati benigne recepti aliud nichil, exposita legacione sua, poposcere quam⁴ quod infra paucos dies super voluntate sua legatos Galli remitterent in Angliam ad Regem. Et ita factum est.

Venerunt Gallorum legati⁵, magne auctoritatis viri, qui pari forma accepti⁶ benigne et honore magno dicendi locum et tempus petunt. Quibus obtentis post longam frustracionem in conuicia tandem erumpunt et irrisum.⁷ Quibus, quamuis contra Regem et Regnum⁸ inhonesta plura dixerunt, est illis tamen ius legacionis obseruatum,⁹ quod vt venerunt sic illesi inuiolatique redierunt.¹⁰

Interim Henricus Rex apparatus belli totis viribus maturabat.¹¹ Set prima cum hereticis et ab ecclesia deuiantibus illi pugna fuit. Erant namque per id temporis in Anglia milites duo equestris ordinis Johannes Oldcastell, qui ante coronacionem Regis ab ipso propter has oppiniones dimissus fuerat et ab famulatu penitus eiectus,¹² et Rogerus¹³ Acton, princeps secte cuiusdam nepharieque supersticionis, quos ingens multitudo similiter errantes sequebantur armata manu contra sacerdotes, ecclesiam et Regem et omne Regnum. Quod vt primum innotuit Regi apud Eltham in Epiphanie solemnitate tam detestabile facinus, et esse quosdam iam collectos in campo scelestos vocato¹⁴ Fiketteffeld in agro London. non procul a Westm., statim in Regiam¹⁵ suam apud Westm. se sine tumultu contulit. Inde conuocatis nonnullis turmis armatis, ac Magistro Thoma Arundell, Cantuariensi Antiste, in campum egressi sunt. Set audito, quod Rex comperisset eorum astuciam, nequaquam apparere ausi sunt; quosdam tam captos digno affecit supplicio. Johannes ille Oldcastell isto anno

¹ instrui vt B.; Prius tamen per omnia fere studia et universitates a iuris tam diuini quam humani peritioribus consilia voluit, instene et Livius, p. 6.

² quod si fieri posset B.

³ ad unum omnes ubi consulunt Livius.

⁴ sua retulere nisi, Livius.

⁵ nuncii B., J.

⁶ viri. Inter quos erat legationis princeps episcopus similiter excepti Livius.

⁷ irrisum, ut non timentes quod Henricus Rex iura sua viribus adipisci conetur B., and Livius.

⁸ Regem et Anglie Regnum B.

⁹ est tamen ius gentium de legatis servatum Livius.

¹⁰ redierunt Livius.

¹¹ conabatur Livius.

¹² penitus abiectus Livius.

¹³ Johannes Livius.

¹⁴ dicto B., J. esse iam collectos in campo scelestos quodam dicto Livius, p. 7.

¹⁵ statim huiusce rei nulla facta significatione bonus rex in regiam Livius.

captus et in turrim London. intromissus, de eadem cito euasit.¹ Rogerus vero Acton hoc eodem anno apprehensus suspensus est.² Prima igitur pugna et victoria huic principi pro Christo et ecclesia Dei contra nephandos supersticiosos fuit.

Hoc eciam anno obiit prefatus Thomas Arundell, Archipresul Cantuar., cui successit Magister Henricus Chichele, Episcopus Meneuensis.³

Anno secundo in parlamento apud Leicestriam⁴ Rex duces creauit eius germanos fratres, Johānem Bedfordie et Humfridum Gloucestrie. Edictum insuper fecit quod quicumque hereticus in Anglie regno sicut hostis Christi ita et proditor regie maiestatis reus haberetur.⁵

Anno tercio, paratis cunctis que profectioni regie necessaria erant, vniuersum exercitum suum in festo Sancti Petri ad Vincula ad Suthamptoniam Rex conuenire iussit.⁶ Vbi tunc patefacta est ingens in Regem coniuratio trium, scilicet Comitis Cantebriggie,⁷ Henrici domini le Scroop, et Thome Gray militis. Hii nempe pro innumera pecunie summa pacti fuerunt Francigenis Regem tradidisse.⁸ Qui post sui facinoris propriam confessionem regni iudicio securi percussi sunt.

⁹ Rex vero idibus Iunii¹⁰ transuelato¹¹ pelago apud Kitcawe in Normannia cum mille et quingentis nauibus applicuit. Deinde vsque Harifluuium progressus, quam circum obsedit diris insultibus ipsam infestando, cuius parietes horrisonis machinarum iaculacionibus pilas lapideas terribiliter euomencium solotenus consternuntur, turres, eciam campanilia forciaque edificia violenter conquaciendo. Propterea laceratis meniis, qui intra villam fuere pauore concussi ac de subsidio¹² penitus desperati villam Regi reddiderunt. Cuius loci prefectum Rex auunculum suum Thomam Beaufort, Comitem Dorsetie, expulsis Francigenis intromissaque ordinacione sua bellica in eandem eidem

¹ Oldcastle's escape from the Tower was in Oct. 1413, three months before the Lollard rebellion.

² nonnullis turmis eos aggressus, nulla pene vi devicit, cepit, occidit, affixitque captos cruci, ductoresque suos nonnullos dies in vinculis detentos digno affecit supplicio. Livius, who thus omits the reference to Archbishop Arundel, which appears also in Chron. Davies, p. 39.

³ Hoc eciam . . . Meneuensis om. J.

⁴ Leicestriam om. Livius.

⁵ Livius has some other variations in this paragraph and adds: et alia decreta. Quae quoniam ex ordine notata sunt alibi, non in hoc opere scribuntur.

⁶ Anno tercio . . . iussit, om. Livius, who here inserts the story of Olandyne.

⁷ unus genere regi propinquus, Comes scilicet Livius; the change may be due to respect for Richard of York.

⁸ Hic . . . tradidisse om. Livius; the text above comes from the Brut, p. 376.

⁹ Livius now follows another source. The text above agrees closely with the other version of the Latin Brut, see pp. 316-17.

¹⁰ A mistake; it should be 15th August.

¹¹ Transuelato ventis secundis J., B.

¹² rescussu C.

prefecit et Rectorem. Durauit autem hec obsidio a xvij die Augusti vsque xx diem Septembris tunc proximo sequentem. Rex vero abinde vsque Cales proficiscens ad vadum de Somme iter arripuit; set fractis pontibus ibidem non patuit transitus¹; idcirco per fluuium de Swerdis ipsum tunc iter carpere necessario oportebat. Vbi exercitus centum millium Gallorum, vt ipsum cum suo exercitu interciperent, viam sibi precludebat. Rex hoc comperto cum parua manu Anglorum, que sibi remanserat,² non plene scilicet octo milium virorum pugnancium, suas direxit acies attente ad prelium, Ducem Ebor., ipso id instancius postulante, prime preferens aciei. Eius vtique ingenio tunc inuentum est vt Anglicus quisque palum acutum ante se haberet in terra defixum,³ ne Anglorum exercitus ab equitibus Gallorum opprimeretur. Quod vtique multum valuit nostris Angligenis in die illa.

Interea instauratur bellum in campo,⁴ qui dicitur Agyncourt, die scilicet Veneris in festo sanctorum Crispini et Crispiniani. Set omnis Angligenarum exercitus vnam porciunculam terre in ore suo sumentes ac terram ante initum certamen trina vice deosculantes, genibus prouolutis, hostes aggrediuntur. Dira et crudelis fit cedes, nam ex crebris ictibus sagittibus sagittarum ruunt vtroque Francorum morientium cadauera; preliatum est autem ab hora prima vsque ad transactum diei medium; solius enim Dei auxilio victi sunt Galli.⁵ Statimque alius hostium non minor exercitus Gallorum se parat ad pugnam, putantes iam fessos Anglicos tam dira et longa pugna. Quem vt viderunt Angli eorum captiuos plurimos quanquam duces⁶ et nobiles morti tradidere. Rex preterea ad nouum Gallorum exercitum haraldos⁷ mittit vt mox aut ad pugnam veniant aut retrocedant, sciantque si illic morentur vel ad prelium veniant omnes quotquot caperentur ex ipsis nulla mediante misericordia gladiis cedentur. Que quidem regia sententia vt innotuit illis, timore percussi redierunt.

Rex tanta victoria potitus ingentes Deo gracias agit, et quod eo die beatorum Crispini et Crispiniani commemoracio fiebat ab ecclesia, quorum suffragiis a Deo victoriam tantam de tot hostibus optinuisse sibi videbatur, statuit vt quoad viueret⁸ singulis diebus in missa quam audierat eorundem beatorum commemoracio fieret.

Hoc in prelio de Gallis cesi sunt serenissimi duces Alencoun, de Barre et Brabancie, et alii plures, videlicet Archiepiscopus de Sauuz,

¹ non patuit transitus om. C.

² que sibi remanserat om. C.

³ Anglici palos bis acutos haberent defixos C.

⁴ curia B., J.

⁵ Here Livius, p. 20, resumes. The resemblance to the other version of the Latin Brut ceases; see p. 316.

⁶ dices Livius.

⁷ faciales Livius.

⁸ quo adiuuaret L.

Comes Nauernie, principalis Constabularius Francie, et alii octo Comites, centum Barones, mille et quingenti milites et nobiles.¹ Numerus autem nobilium interfectorum quasi xj M., relique vero plebis M.M.M.² Capti vero sunt dux Aurelianensis, Dux Burbonie, Arturus ducis Britannie frater, et alii plurimi. Anglicorum Dux Ebor., Comes Suffolchie, et alii ad numerum centum virorum, nullo ex Anglicis capto,³ in prima pugna sunt interfecti.

Cumque aduesperasset ex vno omnium consilio Rex cum suo exercitu in eandem villulam, in qua priori nocte fuerat hospitatus, se recepit; vbi relictis sui exercitus impedimenta et equos plurimos cum curribus et rebus aliis, ac omni vectura sua, a predonibus Gallis, dum pugnaret, comperit asportata.⁴ Et in ipsa cena principes capti nobilissimi Regi ministrarunt. Postera die per ipsius campi medium, vbi pugnatum erat, iter habens, mirabile dictu cesorum corpora spoliata nudaque singula comperiens per castellum suum de Gynes,⁵ vnde ad oppidum Calles Rex cum vniuerso exercitu et concaptiuis profectus est; vbi respiracionis⁶ gracia morula facta Angliam transfretauit, gaudio ineffabili a cunctis receptus.⁷

Interim Sigismundus Romanorum Rex qui magestatem duorum Regnorum audierat, que nuper in bella discriminaque tanta conciderant, premissis ad vtrumque Regnum sue voluntatis nunciis, in Galliam primum, vbi cum omni qua debebat obseruacione recipitur. Apud quos super ineunda cum Anglicis pace retulit, sic et eorum animos mouit vt secum oratores ad id electi mitterentur, quorum Archiepiscopus Remensis legacionis princeps erat. In Angliam inde recta via venit. Quod vt innotuit Henrico Regi Calesiam vltra fretum vbi prius erat nauem accensurus prouidos principes et dominos obuiam mittit, qui tantum principem condigno⁸ in oppidum hospicio recipient.⁹ Regio tunc iussu naues rostrate magne trescente ad hunc Principem et eius commeatum deuehendum parantur, qui tranquillo mari ventisque secundis Douoriam in Angliam delati sunt. Vbi regie stirpis Anglicis principibus et aliis Regni primoribus suscepti London

¹ This sentence appears in the other version, p. 317.

² Brabanciae et ipse Dominus de Helli quem dixi ad regem se de fuga sua purgantem venisse, et alii plures ad decem milia Livius.

³ nullo capto om. Livius.

⁴ plurimos, et alias res dum pugnaret a praedonibus Gallis asportatas comperit. Livius.

⁵ nudaque omnia, conueniens ad Guynes suum castellum B., Ƴ.

⁶ recreacionis B., Ƴ.

⁷ vbi receptus om. Livius, who has a longer account from another source.

⁸ digno, ut decebat Livius.

⁹ Livius inserts the names of the Emperor's chief companions from an English source, cf. Chronicles of London, p. 124.

abinde vsque proficiscuntur¹; vbi si quid magnifici et apparatus regii potest excogitari aduene Regi omnia parata fuere.

Sigismundus postea pacis inchoatum aggreditur in consilium,² in quo Rex Henricus, vt discrimina belli tot tantaque dampna vitarentur, Gallorum offert legatis, si sibi dedant quecunque proauui sui Edwardi tercii fuere tempore magne pacis icte tunc inter duo regna cum hiis que nuper ipse tanto discrimine fuerat adeptus, se bellum relicturum. Set omne propositum renuunt Galli dicentes,³ quamuis fauste sic omnia successissent tunc ad votum Henrici in futurum se subeundum casibus fortune durioris maiorisque discriminis, detrimenta proinde perperessurum;⁴ et obstinato animo infectaque pace in Galliam reuertuntur ad suos.

Sigismundus Romanorum et Henricus Anglie et Francie Reges temporibus istis maxima familiaritate summa mutuaque beneuolencia inter se complexi sunt, ita quod in fraternitatem Militum Garterii Sigismundus ascribi peteret, et ascriptus est.⁵

⁶ Dum hec aguntur in Anglia impacientes ire Galli dedecorisque nuper accepti vliscendi causa cum maxima manu ad obsidendum Harifluuium proficiscuntur; huic exercitui preerat Comes Armeniaci nuper in Francia dictus constabularius, qui per terram primum ex omnibus partibus aditum oppido claudit. Set nec sic⁷ contenti de Januensibus⁸ rostratas maximas naues, quas nos carrucas vocamus,⁹ stipendiarias conducunt ad ora claudenda Sequane fluuii, que sunt Harifluuii portus. Et breuiter sic omnem aditum vndique clausurunt, ita quod Anglicis ex oppido nulla spes egrediendi nec victum¹⁰ recipiendi relinqueretur.

Tunc Comes Dorsetie, huius loci prefectus, omnem obsedionem sui suorumque discrimen Regi nunciat, et summam cibi atque potus inopiam. Quas¹¹ vt innotuerat Regi, statim valida parata classe cum militibus naualibus et terrestribus non paucis ad soluendam hanc obsedionem fuisset profectus, nisi prudentissimus Rex Sigismundus sibi dissuasisset, inter quas increpabat¹² Regem, in quo tocus rei

¹ Livius inserts a longer account of Sigismunda's reception from an English source; cf. Brut, p. 380; the mention of the king's brothers by Livius is peculiar to him.

² aggreditur. Itur in Consilium Livius.

³ Livius puts the reply in slightly different words.

⁴ detrimenta perperessurum om. Livius.

⁵ et ascriberetur Livius.

⁶ At this point begins the close resemblance of our text to Davies's Chronicle.

⁷ claudit. Nec isto, Livius.

⁸ Januensibus Itala civitate, Livius.

⁹ quas istae Karak nationes vocant Livius.

¹⁰ Anglicis spes nulla commeatus alicunde Livius.

¹¹ Quod B., J.

¹² increpauit B., J.; Sigismundus multis et multis persuasionibus id sibi dissuasisset; inter quas usurpabat crebro Livius.

summa reponitur, non sic debere se omnibus obiectare periculis, et istam quam optabat obsedionem per quem ¹ de suis principibus mandato regio eque bene dissolui ² posse confirmabat. Tunc obsequi volens amici Regis sentencie princeps Henricus³ Johannem Bedfordie Ducem huic classi prefectum ad maritimam obsedionem soluendam mittit⁴; qui rates Januensium grossissimas, quas prediximus, obuam habuit: pugnatumque est tunc diucius inter illos. Capiuntur tandem quattuor de maioribus Januensium nauibus et de Gallicis maior pars. Reliquis pene omnibus confractis et submersis, maior quedam ex omnibus euaserat, set in lateribus adeo perforata in eo prelio quod post pusillum sub vndas dimergitur.

Dux autem velut ei fuerat a Rege mandatum cibos et potum, quos secum adduxerat, in Harifluuium intromisit. Omnino ⁵ triremes nonnullae, quas Itali galeas dicunt, in Sequane fluuio cuperent Anglicis ad oppidum aditum impedire. Set validis Anglorum viribus triremes abire compulsi⁶ ad oppidum felici successu profectus ingenti gaudio recipitur a Dorcestrie Comite et reliquis Harifluuii colonis. Postera die Regis pacto mandato Dux optatissimo vento Angliam regreditur.⁷ Rex autem, vt fratrem cum tanta victoria redeuntem vixit, cognito prius quo fuerat ordine pugnatum et quid in omnibus gestum erat, gratias egit Deo immortalis. Et quia ea fuerat optenta victoria feriis Assumpcionis beate Marie virginis mandauit vt singulis diebus vite sue in eius sacrario Antiphona cum versiculo et collecta in commemoratione beate virginis semel a capellanis et sacerdotibus eius decantaretur.

Vt autem plane perspexit Romanorum Rex Sigismundus Gallos nullo modo ad pacem inclinari ad confundendam eorum superbiam, quos eciam in suum imperium et alias et nunc pari elacione nouerat astutos, considerato quoque Anglicorum iustissimo titulo societatem iniit cum Henrico Rege et federa vtrique gratissima.⁸ Que non minus apud heredes et successores suos quam apud seipsos inuiolabilia

¹ quam cupiebat obsidionis solutionem per quenpiam, Livius.

² fieri Livius.

³ princeps prudentissimus Livius.

⁴ Livius here inserts a fuller account of the voyage and battle from another source, and then gives the final clauses with some variation. The text above is from the same original as Davies's Chron., p. 43.

⁵ Quamvis et Livius.

⁶ impedire, dux ipse quibusdam adductis celocibus, quas nominant Anglici barges, et validis Anglorum viribus triremes abire compellunt Livius.

⁷ Postera die cum iam omnia regia sententia perfecisset, dux navim ascendit, et cum captis rostratis et captivis navalibus militibus in Angliam optatissimo vento tranquillissimoque mari proficiscitur Livius; 'The said duke with his prises and prisoners retourned into Engeland agayne.' Davies's Chron.

⁸ Livius has an expanded version of this, and then adds a summary of the terms of the Treaty.

et firma manerent.¹ Et hec anno quarto Regis Henrici septimo idus Octobris acta sunt.²

Hiis temporibus Dux Holandie, cuius nupta tunc erat filia Dolfino,³ Angliam ad videndam magestatem duorum Regum maximamque magnificenciam quam crebrius audiebat predicari, et vt ipse partes suas in sedando bello inter duo Regna nuper orta, adueniens honeste recipitur ab Henrico et suis.

Interim Sigismundus et Henricus Reges legatos, quendam comitem Romanorum Regis et Anglici Comitem Warwici, cum plurimo sapientum comitatu ad Johannem Burgundie ducem miserant; et inter eos sic conuenit quod Dux Burgundie Calesiam ad Sigismundum et Henricum Reges in Octobri proximo pro patranda pace veniret. Quibus sic conuentis ad Reges suos comites reuertuntur.⁴ Hiis ita patratís Romanorum Rex ad Regna sua cogitans se parat ad iter. Henricus vero parata digna classe tantis deuehendis principibus ipse cum multis e suis proceribus vna cum Sigismundo et suis Calesiam profecti sunt. Quo Johannes Dux Burgundie, fide sibi vadibusque datis, ab Anglicis cum honore receptus est. Et quoniam ea que ad pacem conducunt concludendam secum non adduxit, set in elacione sua perseuerantes abire iussi sunt. Henricus inde Romanorum Regem et quotquot eidem famulabantur magnis donariis egregie munerauit, et Angliam non sine magnis fluctibus nauigauit.⁵

Medio tempore Rex Henricus legatos Constanciam ad generale tocius ecclesie consilium legauerat; qui vna cum reliquis et adueniente Romanorum Rege pro vnione sacrosancte Romane ecclesie studerent, et ad tollendum scisma quod trium pastorum tunc vigeat. Quas ob res omnium consensu nacionum hoc in consilio statutum est vt Anglia nacionis nomen optineret, et vna diceretur de quinque que deuocionem prestant Romano pontifici; quod ante id temporis nunquam passi⁶ fuerant aliarum nacionum homines.

Eodem anno Dowglas quidam Comes Scocie proficiscitur in Angliam, fecitque fedus et amicitiam init cum Henrico Rege, quam iureiurando et litteris suis patentibus confirmat. Postea tamen contra iusiurandum periurus ad hostes Gallos profectus est, post mortem Regis

¹ firmaque sinto Livius.

² acta sunt om. Livius.

³ eo quod illius filia delphino tunc nupta foret Livius.

⁴ Livius expands this passage to include an account of Warwick's reception at Lille.

⁵ Livius, whilst using the above, gives a fuller account of events at Calais and of Sigismund's return to Germany.

⁶ temporis livore invidiaque non passi Livius.

in prelio quod gestum est apud Vernulam fortiter pugnans ab Anglicis interfectus est.

Anno quinto Rex in ipsa yeme bellum instaurat, classem parat ex Regni validissimi, et vsque Hamptoniam proficisci iubet, vt cum ventus secundus habeatur in Galliam ad inchoatam tantam rem proficiscitur.

Interim Galli, conductis quibusdam Januensium grossis nauibus, ad ipsius Sequane fauces deiectis ancoris transmittunt. Ad quas expugnandas missus est Johannes Huntingdonie Comes, qui classem illam hostilem duro marte deuincens cum rostratis pluribus captis et captiuis innumeris Hamptoniam reuertitur ad Regem.¹

Post cuius reditum ad vj Kalendis Augusti Rex ex Hamptonia cum nauibus ad mille quingentas et omni suo exercitu ad numerum xvj M. cccc militum² apud Towk in Normannia applicuit.³ Eductoque exercitu e nauibus remissaque classe in Angliam, quosdam de suis principibus ad circumiacencia castra expugnanda mittit.⁴ Quibus deditis ad vrbem Cadomi recte vadit. Qua non paucis cum labore in dedicionem recepta, vrbem petit Rothomagensis ipsius Normannie caput cum obsidione cingens⁵ in girum. Qua in vrbe in primo illic Regis aduentu fertur fuisse hominum, mulierum, paruulorum, iuuenum, et senium ccc^{ta} milia, e quibus quinquaginta milia dira fame perierunt. Nam durante obsedione ciuitas fame permaxima laborabat magis in dies ac magis, ita quod quicquid cibus esse poterat edendi penuria comedunt. At cum cibus defuit, moritur senex et femina, et ipsam matrem moribundam sugitur⁶ infans a matris vberibus dependens mortuus. Spes quidem illis subsidii nulla nisi sola Regis clemencia, quanquam rumor assereret omnem Gallie principem eis in succursum cicius aduenturum.

Tandem post multas et diras cedes mutuaque vulnera multa timentes ciues fame perire gratiam Regis postulantes vrbem reddunt. Durauit hec obsedio a mensis Augusti principio vsque mensis Ianuarii initium. Post deditum Rothomagum deditur et oppidum de Cawdebeck et quotquot Rothomago propinqua fuere.

Tunc legati Karoli dolfini, velut prius conuenerat, cum pleno paciscendi mandato dolfinum obligandi et in eius animam iurandi solemniter

¹ Livius (pp. 30, 31) whilst using the text above, expands it with fresh material from another source.

² sexdecim milia et quadringentos H.; sexdecim milia quadringentos Livius.

³ in Normannia telluri scandentes B., J. Livius here inserts a detailed account of the number and composition of the host.

⁴ After the landing in Normandy Livius (pp. 33-60) follows another source for a long account of the war down to the siege of Rouen. His account of that siege (pp. 60-70) is also independent, though once or twice he seems to quote the text above, cf. pp. 64, 65.

⁵ urgens H.

⁶ sequitur B., H., J., L. For the original see Davies's Chron., p. 47.

edito Rothomagum ad Regem veniunt.¹ Idcirco post hinc inde petita taliter conuenit quod ad quandam² statutam diem dolfinus ad oppidum de Dreux, Rex autem ad urbem Ebroicensem se diuertant, exinde locum medium ex vtriusque sententia vbi princeps vterque pro ferienda pace conueniant electuri. Que sic conuenta³ sigillo suo regio sigillat et munit et iureiurando sine dolo malo⁴ seruire promittit; sic et legati Karoli sigillis suis et in animam ipsius dolfini iureiurando sine dolo presencia pacta seruire promittunt. Dolfinus eciam hec eadem pacta suo sigillo munita Regi remittit.

Rex vero suum statutum tempus seruat, set dolfinus nouo⁵ consilio functus Regem frustratus ad locum sibi statutum non venit; et sic pax infecta est.⁶

Johannes interim Dux Burgundie, cui a Gallis Karoli Regis ob suam aduersam valetudinem cura commissa fuerat, litteris et internunciis cum Rege gratiam querit, et efficit quod Rex legatos ad oppidum de Prouince, vbi prefatus Karolus et Burgundie Dux per id temporis diuertebantur, mittit. Cuius regie legacionis princeps Comes Warwici pauca stipatus comitiua iter ingreditur. Quo in itinere longe⁷ maior Gallorum manus in insidiis lateris Anglicos prestolabatur, vt infecta pace strenuum Comitem Anglicosque ceteros interciperet. Cumque ad locum insidiarum deuenisset, in Anglicos irruunt. Comes cum suis ad terram prosiliens animo forti⁸ ad pugnam conuolat, et ipsum depredari molientes in predam capit.⁹ Qua potitus victoria Comes, premissis ad suos in isto prelio captiuis, vsque Prouinciam¹⁰ legacionem regiam expositurus proficiscitur.¹¹ Qua exposita post¹² multas vtrimque suasionem sic conueniunt, vt Henricus et Karolus prefatus cum eius coniuge¹³ et Burgundie duce in communem locum¹⁴ ad agendum de pace conueniant. Pro quibus firmiter obseruandis Comes Sancti Pauli et Burgundie¹⁵ Ducis filius heres, securi redditus prius habita fide,¹⁶ ad Henricum oratores legatique veniunt. Tunc Rex omnem a suis et Karoli legatis rem edoctus sic cum aduersariis conuenit:

¹ Livius (p. 71) now resumes. The text above is derived from the same source as Davies's Chron., p. 48.

² petita Karoli legati cum rege paciscuntur ut ad quandam Livius.

³ Quo sic conuenito B., J.

⁴ malove ingenio H. ⁵ malo Livius.

⁶ Livius has slightly expanded the text above, which in its turn is somewhat fuller than the English version in Davies Chron., p. 45, and Brut, p. 559. Livius then inserts a notice of the capture of Ivry.

⁷ longa L.; longe Livius.

⁸ manu forti animoque virili H.

⁹ Livius again is a little fuller, and the English somewhat shorter.

¹⁰ Provincia Livius.

¹¹ Livius inserts a notice of Warwick's reception.

¹² per B., J.

¹³ cum coniuge Franciae dicta regina Livius.

¹⁴ simul ad diem locum statutum quandam Livius.

¹⁵ Bourbonie Livius.

¹⁶ fide, cum aliis multis Livius.

quod ad pridie Kalend. Junii Anglicus Rex ad oppidum de Maunt, Karolus et Burgundie Dux ad oppidum de Poyntois se deuerterent,¹ locus vero medius esset ad oppidum de Mulonie² iuxta Sequanam huic negotio commodus. Ad quem neutra pars cum plusquam militum duobus milibus et quingentis perueniret.³ Et quod interim inducie belli firme certissimeque forent. Quem postea locum medium inter duo oppida parauere inter duas fossas limitatum,⁴ quas nullus nisi cuius interesset ingrederetur. Vbi Anglici tentoria regia⁵ cum auro, liliis, leopardis⁶ et variis intertextis figuris erigunt. Itidem et Galli suis cum tentoriis castrametati sunt, et Rex inter duas fossas erectis duobus tentoriis, in quibus ipsi Principes cum eorum consultis viris agere tanta super re secretis tutisque colloquiis possent.⁷ Vt vtriusque Regis dignitas seruaretur et obseruancia digna, palus quidam ipsa in media planicie confixus, ad quem nec vltius alter alteri Regum occurrat. Et statuta die Rex Henricus cum litteratissimis atque sapientissimis viris⁸ re pro tanta necessariis ad oppidum de Maunt pergit. Karolus vero, quia per id temporis sua solita valitudine laborabat, statutum locum non aduenit; set eius vxor et Burgundie Dux cum aliis sui generis regii multis et eximiis Gallorum omnium principibus et duobus militum milibus et quingentis ad oppidum de Pountoys. Vtrique ad medium postea locum deueniunt. Anglicus Rex Regine⁹ prius, post Katerine filie osculum pacis dedit, quod sine rubore virginis esse nequiuit. Tunc et Burgundie Dux cum omni obseruancia principi domine porrecta dextera, simul et Rex cum puella et reliquis in vnum tentorium, vbi de re pacis desiderate¹⁰ agere possunt, conueniunt. Vbi pene per triduum mutuis continuisque pacis colloquiis vsi sunt. Set res inpresenciarum ad optatum finem non deuenit.¹¹ Medio tempore dolfinus cum Burgundie duce litteris et

¹ diverticula sumerent Livius.

² Meulan; Mulanke B., ſ. ³ perueniret om. L.

⁴ forent. Sic et post hoc utriusque statim locum tantorum ad Principum conventum parare duoque medius inter oppida locus inter duas fossas limitatus Livius.

⁵ et Sequanam versus hinc Anglici tentoria frequentes pulcherrima Livius.

⁶ leonibus H.

⁷ tentoriis urbis pulcherrimae castra metantes speciem efficiunt, et inter duas fossas regis erectis duobus tentoriis, in quibus Principes ipsi cum viris prudentibus et sapientibus agere tanta super re secretis tutisque colloquiis possent Livius.

⁸ cum litterarum omniumque divinae et humanae sapientiae viris peritissimis, antistibus et aliis sacerdotibus, qui tanta pro re pactisque pacis feriendis digni consultores essent, et cum suo militum duum milium et quingentorum comitatu, armis auro vestibus argentisque intertextis mirandum in modum decoro Mante ad oppidum pergit. Livius.

⁹ rex Gallorum, ut dicunt, reginae Livius.

¹⁰ re publica desideratae pacis Livius.

¹¹ Livius gives a detailed account of the three days of the conference; the brevity of the text above agrees with Davies's Chron., p. 49.

internunciis agit, quod nec ipse Dux nec ullus ex suis clientibus paci studeat neque consenciat.¹

Et ad quintum Nonas Quintilis,² quibus conuenire debebant, Rex ipse ad locum Gallorum nullus neque Regina neque Dux aduenit.³ Quamobrem plane patuit omnibus hanc pacem non per Anglicos ymmo per ipsos Gallos infectam relinqui. Sic et nichil quicquam bonum tunc euenit, preter quod vise Katerine⁴ quedam amoris flamma Regem⁵ tunc primum accendit.⁶

Ad tercium Kalend. Sextilis oppidum de Pountois Rex recipere⁷ desiderat.⁸ Quo non sine cede et sanguine intercepto cum valida manu fratrem suum Clarencie Ducem Parisius mittit. Qua in breui dedita cum preda maxima reuertitur ad Regem.⁹ Rex ex oppido de Pountois egressus vsque Castellum de Bokyndevillers et Gisorcium tendit, que cito deduntur eidem.¹⁰

Dum hec aguntur Dux Burgundie, qui prius amiciciam gratiamque Regis quesierat, allectus Dolfini pollicitacionibus in instituto non perseuerat; cum ad Castellum de Motereaux, vbi tunc temporis morabatur Dolfinus, de tractanda inter se p^{ac}e¹¹ aditus redditusque securi sibi data fide profectus esset, contra fidem a prefato Dolfino cesus inhumaniter,¹² spoliatus et nudus in puteum deiectus est.

Huius Ducis filius et heres Philippus Burgundie Dux, postquam tanti facinoris¹³ certos nuncios habuit, deliberato prius consilio gratiam Regis¹⁴ querere et secum pacis fedus inire¹⁵ statuit, quod et factum est.¹⁶

Eodem tempore Karoli Regis et Philippi Ducis Burgundie, ac ciuium Parisiensium oratores vsque Maunt ad Henricum Regem super con-

¹ Livius (p. 75) inserts: Quod impetratum causa fuit ut hiis in per maximum dolum et contra fidem datam a Delphino crederetur.

² v nonas of August Davies's Chron.; Quintilis Livius.

³ dux constitutum adiit Livius.

⁴ regiae Katerinae Livius.

⁵ Martium Regem Livius.

⁶ Livius inserts an account of a revolt at Rouen.

⁷ capere B., J.

⁸ Livius (pp. 75-7) gives a long account of the capture of Pontoise. The text above accords with Davies's Chron.

⁹ and he got it, and returned ayen to the Kyng, Davies's Chron.; Livius correctly describes Clarence's expedition, at more length, as a reconnoitre.

¹⁰ Livius has a longer account of the operations before Vauconuilliers and Gisors. Davies's Chron. has simply: and than gat the kyng Bokyn de Villers.

¹¹ ad quaedam inter se super eorum reconciliata gratia deque re publica Livius.

¹² immaniter Livius; vnmanli Davies's Chron.

¹³ luctus Livius.

¹⁴ cum suis omnibus clientibus, amicis et sequacibus habito diligenti consilio intermissam regis Livius.

¹⁵ et inire om. Livius.

¹⁶ quod est om. Livius, who inserts an account of the negotiations at Gisors, and of the capture of St. German's, Montjoye, and Meulan; Davies's Chron. has simply: as sone as Philip his sone and his heir wiste of this, he becam kyng Harries manne. H. inserts: Graciam namque suam duci Philippo non denegat a bonis operibus et fidis eam sequatur.

cupita pace secum acturi veniunt. Set quia maximis belli negotiis animus regius intentus erat, et non credebat illos satis ad pacem, quamvis illam tociens peterent, inclinatos res illic finem non habuit optatum, qui postea fuit in vrbe Rothomago totus absolutus.¹ Post hec Henricus Rex, dum in Rothomago pro Christi nataliciis celebrandis instaret, Karoli Regis et Bugundie Ducis Oratores ad se veniunt. Quibus Rex Henricus Comitem Warwici cum viris consultis plurimis et armatorum valida manu cum pleno mandato et potestate de pace patranda legatum remittit.² At post multas et solertes hinc inde labores inter Karolum et Henricum pax euenit et affinitas, conubium videlicet Katerine virginis filie Karoli Regis Francie et Henrici Regis.

Set quia nonnulla videbantur quibus duorum Regum, tum propter apponenda regia sigilla tum ob futurum coniugium, opus erat presencia, quia et Karolus graui sepe valitudine laborabat et erat senior valde, sic interconuenit quod Henricus cum armatorum quanta velit manu ad predicta patranda³ Trecas⁴ veniat statuta quadam die, qua⁵ si non venit omnia pro infectis habeantur.⁶ Hiis ita conuentis Comes ad Regem reuersus scriptis coram eo queque pacta fuerant narrat. Rex vero abinde vsque oppidum de Nogent super Sequanam situm Trecis appropinquare cepit.⁷ Cui Philippus Burgundie Dux cum grandi procerum et equitum comitatu obuiam veniens eum cum summa obseruancia et ingenti gaudio recepit.⁸

Postque tunc multos et varios tractatus ad xij Kalend. Junii, Karoli Regis anno xlvmo, in Episcopali templo Rex cum Duce Clarencie suo fratre et reliquis principibus suis, aliisque nobilibus ac Isabella Regina cum duce Burgundie pro Karolo ipso tunc in valitudine sua laborante et suis propriis nominibus cum consilio Regis Karoli et tribus statibus Francie, pax inter duo Regna Francie et Anglie facta est certisque condicionibus approbata.⁹ At Karolus cum sigillo suo regio literis

¹ Livius inserts: Nunc ad alia transeamus; and then gives (pp. 80, 81) an account of the siege of Château Gaillard and the war in Maine. The text above translates Davies's Chron.

² Livius has a fuller account of Warwick's march to Troyes.

³ complenda Livius.

⁴ Nogent vpon Sayne Davies's Chron.

⁵ Ad quam Trekarum urbem dicta die Livius.

⁶ Livius inserts: Sed quia invictissimi pontes erant intermedii, per quos regius exercitus venturus erat, videlicet Charenton et Nogent, ipsorum Anglicae potestati libera custodia consignatur.

⁷ Livius describes the march to Troyes at more length. Davies's Chron. has simply: the king fro thennes went to Nogent.

⁸ Livius (p. 83) here inserts an account of Henry's reception at Troyes, and of the preliminary negotiations.

⁹ Livius expands this; he explains the meaning of 'tribus statibus'. The text above is a close translation of Davies's Chron., p. 51.

sigillatis cunctis principibus, proceribus et ceteris ligeis suis pacem factam declarat,¹ quam sub pena lese magestatis seruent inuiolatam et in manibus Henrici Regis Anglie et Francie Regentis seruandam illesam inuiolatamque seruare curent.² Mox Isabella Regina Francie et Philippus Burgundie Dux nomine Karoli Regis, velut ab eo suoque consilio in mandatis habuerant, in animam Regis prefati ad sacra Dei evangelia per ipsum successores et heredes suos pacem inter duos Reges conuentam et pactam cum variis condicionibus sine dolo malo³ seruare et seruari facere imperpetuum iurauere.⁴ Idem iusiurandum nominibus propriis Isabella Regina et Philippus Burgundie Dux Henrico Regi, eius successoribus, heredibusque suis prestiterunt, et ita iurauerunt tres status Francie et quotquot illic fuere.⁵ Et ad nonum Kalend. Junii coram Isabella Regina, consilio Regis Karoli, parlamento et tribus statibus Francie, ac Anglicis principibus predictis ac antistibus ac aliisque viris nobilissimis connubium per verba de presenti inter Henricum Regem et Katerinam virginem Karoli Regis Isabelleque Regine filiam solemniter celebratum est.⁶

Mox vero vt pax connubium et federa clausulis et condicionibus hiis super rebus de iure consuetis patrata sunt, velut pactum erat, Rex Henricus vnacum Karolo Rege, duabusque Reginis Isabella et Katerina, ac Burgundie Duce, Senonensem ad vrbem obsedendam Parisius metropolitanam et sibi rebellem cum exercitu maximo vadit, cui confestim ciues vrbem reddidere.⁷ Inde vero ad oppidum de Meleduno castra ponit, quam obsedionem ab Idibus Iulii vsque ad Nouembrem multis in angustiis tenuere. Demum inedia coacti locum dederunt.⁸

Dedito Meleduno Reges, Regine, et Dux Philippus cum suis exercitibus Parisius ad ipsam Galliarum omnium vrbem pergunt.⁹ Quibus obuiam veniunt ciues cum apparatu magno.¹⁰ Ad viij. Idus Januarii Henricus et Katerina, relicto Parisius Thoma Exoniensi Duce et in

¹ declarabat B., ꝑ.

² Livius again expands; the text above is a little fuller than Davies's Chron.

³ malove ingenio H.

⁴ Livius reproduces with slight variations; Davies's Chron. is briefer.

⁵ et ita . . . fuere om. Livius, who then inserts Duke Philip's oath, and proceeds Et ita iurarunt quotquot illuc fuerunt, giving a list of the French dignitaries who swore.

⁶ Livius expands: the text translates Davies's Chron. Livius (pp. 85-8) then inserts the terms of the Treaties with France and Burgundy.

⁷ Livius expands slightly: the English is shorter. Livius then inserts a notice of the siege of Montreueau.

⁸ Demum cum iam cibos et potum in sextum diem non haberent locum dederunt B., ꝑ. Livius incorporates the two last sentences above in his own much longer account.

⁹ principem vrbem accedant Livius.

¹⁰ Dedito . . . magno om. B. Livius inserts an account of Henry's stay at Paris.

Normannia Regente Duce Clarencie fratre suo, qui Dux, dum ipse Rex esset in Anglia, in prelio a Scotis¹ cesus est, Angliam profecti sunt. Die vero dominica, xiiij die Februarii,² coronata est Katerina London, anno viij Regis Henrici.³

Ad mediam post estatem Rex, relicta domi Katerina, cum maximo comitatu in Franciam reuersus,⁴ captisque paruis Castellis⁵ hostiliter inimicantibus, ad urbem Meldensem obsidendam pergit.⁶ Qua in obsidione nunciatus est Henrico Regi partus Regine.⁷ Post autem purificationem partus in Franciam Regina reuertitur.⁸ Post urbem redditam Parisius graditur Henricus, qui dum se ad obsidionem oppidi de Cone⁹ pararet, morbus grauissimus eum inuadit et magis ac magis in dies accreuit, donec Rex spiritum et animam Deo reddens expirauit vltimo die Augusti in Castello de Boys Vyncent prope Parisius, cum regnasset annis ix, mensibus quinque, tribus septimanis et tribus diebus, et apud Westm. sepelitur.¹⁰

¹ a Scotis om. Livius.

² Henry reached London on 14th Feb., but Catherine, who only entered the city on 21st Feb., was not crowned till Sunday, 23rd Feb. Davies's Chron., p. 52, has the same error.

³ For this sentence Livius substitutes matter of his own.

⁴ Livius inserts a brief account of Henry's campaign.

⁵ post terga relictis nonnullis sibi parvis castellis Livius.

⁶ Livius inserts a notice of the siege.

⁷ Livius expands in compliment to Henry VI.

⁸ From this point Livius (pp. 94, 95) gives a longer and independent account of Henry's last days, whilst preserving a few phrases like 'spiritum et animam Deo reddens expiravit'. The text above translates Davies's Chron., p. 52.

⁹ Cane, B., J.

¹⁰ B. and J. adds: ad cuius obitum rex Carolus dueque regine Francie et Anglie presentes fuerunt. Livius has ubi rex Karolus duaeque reginae praesentes aderant.

VI. BRIEF NOTES FOR 1440-43

These Notes, as explained on pp. 155-56 above come from Royal MS. 13 C. 1 at the British Museum. Four Chronicles¹ are contained in that volume, of which that for the reign of Henry V seems to be in an earlier hand than the others; it is written right across the page instead of in double columns, and is on a different paper. The other three Chronicles are written for the most part in the same hand, on a paper which has for watermark a bunch of grapes. But ff. 77-84 are written on an unwatermarked paper, and in part at all events present some differences of handwriting. The text on f. 77 begins 'ab eis accurate inquirentes', and f. 84 ends 'proclamari instituit Rex apud'.² In the second column of f. 79^{ro}, on f. 79^{vo}, and in the second column of f. 83^{vo} are written the alternative versions here printed. None of this matter, some of which has been erased, appears in the other MS. of the Chronicle—Sloane, 1776, also at the British Museum. The Sloane MS. ends abruptly with 'pro vtilitate et aggregatione',³ thus omitting the final version of the fate of Eleanor Cobham as printed by Dr. Giles from the Royal MS.⁴ But on f. 90^{vo} the Sloane text proceeds directly from 'iussionibus fideliter obtemperare' (f. 79^{ro} of the Royal MS.)⁵ to 'Anno xix^o dicti Regis Henrici venerunt' (f. 80^{ro} of the Royal MS., which reads 'Et hoc eodem anno venerunt'). Most of the alternative passages here printed come in between, and it seems clear that the Sloane MS. follows what the scribe conceived to be the final intention of his original in the Royal MS. Dr. Giles's text appears to be derived from a transcript of the Sloane MS.

I have commented on the most interesting features of these notes above.⁶ A few further remarks are necessary. The first passage with the final version of the execution of Richard Wiche is written as an addition in a blank space on f. 79^{ro}. The description of him as vicar of 'Armetesworth' points to the derivation of this Chronicle from the *Brut*⁷; usually he is styled Vicar of Deptford. The earlier references to the Beauforts seem to be favourable, and like the comment on Richard, Duke of York, are in contrast with the Yorkist tone of the later Chronicle; the final note on John Beaufort is rather hostile. On the account of Eleanor Cobham, where we get something new, see p. 156 above. John Oldhall was presumably the young son of Sir William Oldhall (1390-1466), whose existence has been doubted.⁸ The father was on York's council in 1440, but could not be described as 'iuuenis'; it was probably with reference to John Oldhall that the writer says of York 'concilio iuuenum regebatur'. But John Oldhall must have died young, for when Sir William Oldhall died in 1460, his heir was his daughter Mary, wife of Walter Gorges.

¹ See pp. 25, 62-3 and 155-56 above.

² Chron. Giles, pp. 21-33.

³ Id. p. 29.

⁴ Id. p. 30.

⁵ Id. p. 22.

⁶ See p. 156.

⁷ Brut, p. 508; cf. Davies's Chron., p. 56.

⁸ Dict. Nat. Biog. xlii. 105.

(1) ENTRIES FOR 1440-41

[Un erased version.]¹

Anno decimo octauo Ricardus Wike, wicarius de Armetesworth in Estsaxia, conuictus fuerat de antiqua heresi, quam prius abiurauerat et tanquam relapsus ab ordine sacerdotali et ab omni ordine sacro subordinato prius colato est degradatus, et iuxta Turrim London. incendii supplicio est commissus.

Anno xix. obiit apud Bermussey in Sothewerkke Margareta, Clarencie ducissa, octauo die Januarii et in ecclesia Christi Cantuarii in capella sancti Michaelis, quam fundauit, inter dominum Thomam, ducem Clarencie, et dominum Johannem, comitem Somersetie, eius coniugatos, honorifice sepellitur.

[Two alternative versions erased.]²

(a) Anno xviii^o. Ricard Viche, vicarius de Armetesworth in Estsexia, de antiqua heresi, quam prius abiurauerat, fuerat conuictus, et sic relapsus iuxta Turrim London. meruit post degradacionem ordinis penam incendii sustinere.

Eodem anno recuperata erat villa de Herflewe per Edmundum, Comitem de Morten, et dominum Johannem de Talbot, qui multum humaniter circauerunt per tempora et tempora longiora. Eodem anno Dux Ebor. exaltatus est in regentem Francie et Normandie. Set ibidem permansit vix per duos annos, et nichill contra emulos optinere valuit, quod eius satilites non erant ad guerras expediti. Eodem anno liberabatur de carceribus Johannes Bewforth, comes Somercetie, qui tempore interfeccionis patris sui, ducis Clarencie, fuerat captus.

(b) Anno xviii^o. Ricardus Wiche, vicarius de Armetesworth, qui ante plures annos conuictus fuerat de heretica prauitate, quam penitus abiurabat et imposita penitencia relapsus posterius est probatus, quare degradari a dignitate ordinis meruit, et posterius ad comburendum London. iuxta Turrim, in festo sancti Botulphi confessoris et abbatis, condemnari legalia decreta discernunt.

Anno xix^o. Eodem anno per dominum comitem de Morten et dominum de Talbot recuperata fuit villa de Herflu, que prius ex negligencia et inhumanitate custodientis fuerat perdita. Et eodem tempore Dux Ebor. fuerat regens et locumtenens in partibus transmarinis, set modicum contra emulos laborauit, quia iuuenis fuit et concilio iuuenum regebatur. Eciam eodem anno liberatus Johannes ¹ Added in the second column of f. 79^{ro}.² On f. 79^{ro}.

Bewforde, Comes Somercetie. a captiuitate sua tempore occisionis ducis Clarencie patris sui ; et liberatus fuit pro solucione redempcionis comitis de Ewe captiuati in bello de Agincovrt.

A^o xix^o. Obiit Margareta, ducissa Clarencie, apud Bermesey, viz. in octaua die Januarii et apud Cantuariam in capella Sancti Michaelis, australi parte ecclesie, quam ipsa fabricari fecit, inter suos olim coniugatos, viz. dictum dominum Thomam, ducem Clarencie, et dominum Johannem, Comitem Somercetie, tumulatur.¹

(2) THE STORY OF ELEANOR COBHAM

(a) [First erased version.]²

Eodem anno xix^o. fuit domina Elinora, vxor ducis Glocestrie, filia Reginaldi Cobham, Regi Anglie accusata de conspiracione mortis eius per diuersos nigromanticos et astrologicos contemplando superstiosas artes, vnde coniecturare valeat signis erraticis aut demoniis diuinationibus eius prauitatis concilium perimplere : set licet inferiora lege reguntur astrorum, interdum regula fallit, cum sapiens mediante diuino auxilio dominatur astris ; ut quidam astrorum metricus affatur, lege planetarum magis inferiora reguntur : ista set interdum regula fallit opus, vix mediante deo sapiens dominatur astris fata, nec immerito quod nouitates agunt. En ista domina non caute concupitur infortunia agnoscere et euitare satagebat, cum ipsa in honoribus et maxime dignitatis culmine posita, vt puta, tempore iocunditatis et leticie viz. in nocte apostolorum Petri et Pauli splendide cum copia nobilium equitando, rotam sue felicitatis fortuna subuertit in dolorem, cum ipsa eciam et omnes fautores et conciliarii statim arestari iubentur, quorum Rogerus Bollyngbroke, nigromanticus, suspensus et decapitatus existit, magister Thomas Sothewell in Turre London, ante diem sue condemnationis morte preuentus est, Margeria Jordane de Eye condemnationata est de arte phitonica aut sortilega, et sic tandem London. in Smethfelde combusta fuit. Set ipsa domina Elinora, ducissa Glocestrie, primo ad penitenciam publicam artatur, deinde ad carceres perpetuas custodiri cum paucis adiudicatur. Et sic patet quod sinistre incipitur et occultis sceleribus continuatur. In fine tandem.

(b) [Second unerased version.]³

Eodem anno in vigilia apostolorum Petri et Pauli domina Elinora, vxor ducis Glocestrie, equitauit per ciuitatem London. cum pluribus

¹ This paragraph has not been erased. ² In the second column of f. 79^{vo}.

³ In the first column as far as 'cenante', continued in the second to 'perpetuas', the conclusion being written at the foot of both columns.

dominis et magnatibus in splendidissimo apparatu. Set eadem nocte, ipsa cenante in le Chepe apud kynges heede habuit nuncium sue accusacionis contra regiam maiestatem esse ream, vnde incontinenter ex post ad publicam penitenciam fuerat astricta, et postremo ad carceres perpetuas condempnata. Eciam Rogerus Bullingbr., magist. Thomas Sothewell, et Margeria Jordane, omnes conuicti erant de arte nigromantica, vnde dicta Margeria combusta fuit, et Rogerus suspensus, et prefatus magister Thomas preuentus est morte ante diem eius condempnacionis.

(3) FURTHER VERSIONS FOR 1440-43.¹

Eodem anno² recuperata fuit villa de Herflu, que prius perdita fuit ex defectu custodiencium et specialiter per set recuperata per Edmundum Bewfurd, tunc Marcas Dorcetie, et Johannem Talbot, comitem Salopie. Set Ricardus, Dux Eboraci, apud Rothomagum residens et concilio domini Johannis Oldehall gubernat, modicum aut nichil contra emulos militauit.

Eodem anno venit Johannes Bewford, Comes Somercetie, a captiuitate francorum, diu per annos plurimos detentus eo quod non poterat alio modo redimi quam per cambium domini comitis de Ewe, sub cuius matris demonstratu fuerat detentus; vnde prefatus Johannes pro sua redempcione domino Regi Anglie satisfacere est compulsus.

Anno 20 Johannes Bewford, comes Somercetie, in ducem Somercetie fuerat erectus, ac gladio precinctus, et cappe et circuli aurei in capitis sui per manus regis superimposicione realiter investitus, et omnimodis dicto statui ducatus preeminenciis insignitus, versus francigenas cum magna stipendiorum exercitu dirigitur. Ubi paruum profuit, set stipendium regni inaniter consumpsit, et quia infra quattuor menses in Angliam sine honore rediit, et infra annum post finem huius vite cursus ex inopinata infirmitate complevit.

¹ f. 83^{vo}.

² The 18th of Henry VI, i. e. 1439-40.

VII. A CHRONICLE FOR 1445 TO 1455

This brief Chronicle comes from Harley MS. 3884, which contains Higden's Polychronicon with Continuations. The latter part of the reign of Richard II follows the narrative of the Monk of Evesham and comes down to 1402, ending on f. 225^{vo} 'fecerat de die in diem' (Vita Ricardi, p. 177). Several leaves are then missing, and the narrative opens on f. 226 at the siege of Rouen with a narrative translated from the English Brut, pp. 387-9. The first paragraph is, however, peculiar:

Dicendum est de obsidione regis supradicti contra dictam ciuitatem. Anno supradicto die veneris ante festum quod dicitur ad Vincula Sancti Petri tentoria dicti Regis fuerunt fixa ad finem orientalem in quadam domo ¹religiosorum destructa ante eius aduentum per Francigenas, et cum eo multi proceres fuere assignati. Die sabbati proximo assignatum fuit fundum capitaneis Anglicis; die lune proximo proclamatum fuit, quod quilibet homo caperet fundum suum secundum assignaciones dicti regis et suorum deputatorum. Dux Clarencie ad finem occidentalem cum aliis proceribus in abbathia de songerualis ² destructa &c.

After describing the siege of Rouen in this translation from the English Brut, the Chronicle begins again with the narrative for the French expedition of 1417 (Inc. 'Anno quinto Rex Henricus in ipsa hyeme bellum instaurat') from the longer version of the Latin Brut (see p. 331 above). After the conclusion of his new source in 1437 the compiler left a gap of seven years. There then follows on ff. 228-9 the brief Chronicle here printed. This is followed by two paragraphs: 1. On the reckoning of regnal years; 2. On the descent of Henry VI from Woden and Adam. At the end come Lists of the Archbishops of Canterbury and the Popes. The first list ends with John Stafford, who died in 1452. The second ends with Pius II, who succeeded in 1458; of most of the Popes there are brief biographical notes, the last being for Nicholas V (d. 1455). The Chronicle was no doubt written between 1455 and 1460.

The list of constituencies represented in the Parliament of 1445-6 is curious, and would be interesting if it could be depended on, since the only extant returns for that Parliament are for Norfolk and Lynn. The number of knights is correctly given as 74; but the list erroneously includes Cheshire, and omits Sussex. The normal maximum number of boroughs was 99, which allowing for the 4 London members, gives 200 burgesses as stated. The Chronicler's list has however only 98 boroughs. The total number of boroughs varied: in 1436-7 it was ninety-four, in 1446 ninety-eight, and in 1448-9 ninety-nine. Whilst the total was fairly regular, the contributing boroughs often changed, some of the small boroughs being represented in one Parliament and not in another. But no other list includes 'Tachame' (Thatcham) and Henley. It looks as though the writer knew what was the normal number; and finding that, after his geographical list was finished the number was still short, tried to make it up. It is curious that the three last names belong to Oxfordshire and Berkshire; the regular boroughs for those counties are given in their proper place; Windsor was an irregular borough. It would be hazardous to argue from the three towns thus singled out that the Chronicle was written in their neighbourhood; but the reference to Duke Humphrey's benefaction to the University of Oxford suggests strongly that the writer of this Chronicle was an Oxford Scholar. See further p. 158 above.

¹ The Charterhouse.

² St. Gervase.

Anno domini M.ccccxliij^o, et anno xxiiij^o dicti regis Henrici sexti erat parliamentum tentum apud Westm., quod incepit post festum purificationis beate marie, et duravit per annum vnum et mensem fere vsque festum pasche anno eiusdem domini regis xxiiij^o.¹ In quo parlamento fuerunt septuaginta et quatuor milites de triginta et vij comitatibus, videlicet de Northumbria, Cumberland, Westmorland, Lancast., Cestre, Eborac., Lincoln, Notyngnam, Derbeia, Lecestr., Warwic, Rotelond, Northampton, Bethf.,² Buck., Cantebrigia, Hunt- yngdon, Northf., Suff., Essex, Hertford, Midd., Kancia, Surr., Oxonia, Berkch., Salopia, Stafford, Herford, Gloucestr., Wigorn., Gloucestr., Wilshir, Southampton, Somersed, Dors., Deuon et Cornubia. Duo milites de quolibet comitatu. Expense militum vij libr. viij s., capiendo per diem duos s. quilibet miles. Duo burgenses de qualibet villa. Summa villarum xx^{liij} xix. Summa burgensium cc. Expense burgen- sium diatim x. li., capiendo quilibet per diem xij d. Nomina villarum, Bristollia, London ciuitas de qua erant quatuor Burgenses, Ebor., Nouum castrum super Tynam, Norwic., Hastyng, Wynchilsee, Rye, Romene, Hethe, Douer, Sandwiche, Karlelle, Appelby, Kyngeston super Hulle, Scardeburgh, Ciuitas Lincoln, Grimesby, Notyngnam, Derby, Leycestr., Warwic, Northampton, Bethford, Wycombe, Cantabrig, Hunt yngdon, Len Episcopi, Yarmouthe, Yeppyswiche, Donewiche, Colchest., Maldon, Cantuaria, Rochestr., Blechynglegh, Rygate, South- werk, Chycestr., Lewes, Horsham, Shorham, Arundell, Midhurst, Estgrenested, Oxonia, Radyngia, Walyngford, Stafford, Nouum castrum vndurlyne, Briggennorth, Hereford, Leomestr., Gloucestr., Wigorn, Nouum Sarum, Wylton, Vetus Sarum, Ludgaresale, Wotton, Deuyse, Malmesbury, Cryklade, Bedwynde, Marleburgh, Dounton, Calne, Chyppenham, Wynton, Southamton, Portesmouth, Bathe, Welles, Taunton, Briggewater, Shaftesbury, Warham, Dorcestr., Brydport, Melcombe, Weymouth, Lyne, Exedr., Derthmouthe, Plymton, Tauestoke, Bernestaple, Totenesse, Plymmouthe, Helston, Bodmen, Leskerth, Truron, Lostwethiell, Drunhede, Tachame, Wyndeshore, Henlye.

¹ The Parliament sat from 25th Feb. 1445 (N. S.) to 9th April, 1446 (Rot. Parl. v. 66).

² Bedford.

Et eodem anno xxiii^o ¹ regis predicti post festum Corporis Christi idem rex desponsauit Margaretam Reginam suam, filiam Regis Cecilie et Jerusalem, ac Ducis Andegaue.

Et anno eius xxvj^o ² mortem subiit temporalem dux Gloucestrie, Vmfridus, filius Henrici quarti, frater Henrici quinti, et patruus Henrici sexti, in parlamento apud Bury in vigilia sancti Mathie apostoli, circiter mediam noctem. Qua hora obiit Eugenius papa quartus Anno domini millesimo cccc^o xlvj^o. Hic dux erat vix literatissimus, verus zelator studii, fidei, ecclesie, cleri, et regni, qui dotaui et ditauit vniuersitatem Oxonie libris omnium scienciarum et facultatum preciosis, pulchris et sumptuosis, vbi ipsius nomen et memoria sunt et erunt in eternum ascripta diuine memorie pariter et humane :

Non moritur, set mutatur, quia semper habetur

Ipsius egregium nomen in orbe nouum

Anno eiusdem domini regis Henrici xxvij^o in parlamento tento apud Westmonasterium Willelmus de la Pool, dux Southfolchie, multis prodicionum articulis accusatus turri London. commissus,³ ibique noctanter ab excubiis ciuitatis vocibus altisonis et horribilibus proditor regis et regni acclamatus; deindeque translatus ad Westm.⁴ ibique per paucos dies latuit ob timorem communitatis regni instanter et constanter accusantis eum de diuersis prodicionum articulis: et abinde clam aufugit ad villam de Ypswyche in Suffolch. ; ibi expectabat vsque post pascha. Et ab hinc arripuit mare ut euaderet ad partes Francie. Set quedam naus, vocata Nicholas of the Toure, dedit ei obuiam inter Calisiam et Dorborinam, et ibidem in quodam loco maris, vocato Scaleshif, tercio die post capcionem eius decapitatus mandato nautarum, qui miserunt eius corpus cum capite ad terram. Forma accusationis eius sic sequitur.⁵

Anno eiusdem domini regis xxix^o insurreccio Cancie super Blackheth prope London., circiter festum pentecost, sub nomine Johannis Cade ; qui annus in toto erat turbulentus in cedicione populi in diuersis locis regni.

In hiis vero duobus annis precedentibus post mortem dicti domini Vmfridi, ducis Gloucestrie, fuerat tribulacio horrenda in regno, duo episcopi occisi per plebeos, viz. Adam, Episcopus Cirencestr.,⁶ et Willelmus episcopus Sarum; crudeliter et nequiter multi alii fuerunt perempti in diuersis locis regni.

¹ An error: read xxij^o; the day was 30th May, a week before Corpus Christi Day (6th June).

² An error: read xxv^o.

³ On 28th January.

⁴ On 9th March.

⁵ It is not given.

⁶ Read Cicestr.

Item anno eiusdem regis xxxiiij^o dominus rex, itinerans de Londoniis versus Leycestriam ad parliamentum ibidem tenendum; die Jouis proximo ante festum pentecostes, viz. xxj^o die Maii Ricardus, dux Eboraci, Ricardus Comes Sarum, Ricardus, filius eius comes Warwyk, dederunt obuiam dicto domino regi apud Sanctum Albanum, vbi interfecti fuerunt Edmundus, dux Somersecie, Henricus, comes Northumbrie, dominus Clifford, Baro nobilis, cum aliis generosis et plebeis ad numerum circiter centum et quadraginta virorum. Et rex reuersus est Londonias; et, ut fama laborabat, dictus dux Somersecie habebatur suspectus de malo regimine erga regem et regnum.

VIII. SHERBORNE ANNALS

1437—1456

These short Annals come from Harley MS. 3906, ff. 108-11, in the British Museum. They are written as a Continuation of the Latin Brut (see p. 158 above). Their main interest consists in the account of the troubles at Sherborne in 1450, of which the only other notice is given in Gregory's Chronicle,¹ where it is related that after the murder of Bishop Ayscough there was much plundering and rioting especially at Sherborne. 'And the men that toke apon hem alle thys mys rewle, whenne they vndyrstode that hyt was wronge that they hadde done bothe to hym, and in specyalle unto the kynge, they anon wente thoroughe owte all the towne of Shyrborne an toke to every man, woman, and chyld that was above xij yere age and iij chore, everyche of hem hadde vj*l*.; and they madde them to swere to be trewe and holde to gedyr, by cause yf the kynge wolde have take any execucyon apon hyt he moste have take hyt apone the hoole schyre and contrays there that hys lyfode was. And for cause here of the kynge gaffe a generale pardon to alle maner men.' The narrative below also shows that the rioting at Sherborne followed closely on the murder of Ayscough, which took place on 29th June. But the disturbances went on for a long time and only came to a head on 11th Sept. (SS. Prothus and Jacinctus).² On 19th August James Gresham wrote to John Paston that it was reported there were nine or ten thousand men up in Wiltshire: 'but I trow it is not so, for here is now little speech thereof.'³ It is possible that this report had reference to what was happening at Sherborne. On 20 Sept. Robert, lord Hungerford, and others were directed to call together the King's lieges and go against the traitors and rebels in Wiltshire and the adjoining counties.⁴ Other allusions show how widespread the disturbances were⁵; the history of many of them is even more obscure than that of the troubles at Sherborne has hitherto been.

The Sherborne riot was in part a recrudescence of a previous disturbance in 1436-7. The people at Sherborne had long used a part of the nave of the Abbey as their parish church. In 1436 the monks had the font moved to a position, which obstructed, as it was alleged, this use of the nave. The parishioners retaliated by disturbing the Abbey services with the ringing of their bells. Robert Neville, bishop of Salisbury, in consequence visited Sherborne on 12th Nov. 1436, and on 8th Jan. 1437 gave a decision by which the font was to be restored to its former position, and the vexatious ringing of the bells to cease. This decision was apparently upset by an appeal to the King and the Pope. In a subsequent riot, on 28th Oct. 1437, a priest of All-Hallows Church 'shot a shaft with fire into the top of that part of S^t Mary's Church that divided the east part that the monks used from the [part that the] townsmen used: and this partition chancing at that time to be thatched in, the roof was

¹ Collections of a London Citizen, p. 195.

² See p. 348 below.

³ Paston Letters, ii, 162.

⁴ Cal. Pat. Rolls, Henry VI, v, 434.

⁵ See the references to disturbances in Worcestershire and Flintshire on p. 366 below, and at Gloucester on p. 355.

set afire, and consequently all the whole church, the lead and bells melted, was defaced'.¹ This fire resulted in the rebuilding of the Abbey, which must have been in progress at the time of the riot in 1450. In 1446 the abbey had licence to acquire lands in mortmain in recognition of their choir, bell-tower, and bells having been burnt by a sudden fire.² William Bradford was Abbot during the whole period of the troubles, from 1436 to 1457.

Harley 3906 is a very small quarto of 111 leaves of parchment. In one or two places the text seems to be careless. The chronology of the early years is faulty.

Anno domini Mccccxxvii^o combusta erat ecclesia de Chirborn in Dorsetia, in die apostolorum Symonis et Jude,³ litera dominicali G.

Anno domini Mcccxlo⁴ obiit Katerina regina, mater Regis Henrici v^{ti}, et sepulta est apud Westmonasterium.

Anno domini Mcccxliij^o ⁵ in mense Aprilis applicuit Margareta filia Regis Cecilie, vt dicebatur, apud Portesmoth.

Anno domini Mcccxlv^o ⁶ parliamentum apud Byry in principio quadragesime, vbi moriebatur dominus Humfridus dux Glouc., et auunculus Regis, in vigilia sancti Mathei apostoli,⁷ et sepultus est apud sanctum Albanum. Eodem anno obiit papa Eugenius.

Anno domini M.cccc.lix^o. in Octobre apparuit sol sanguineus, grande spectaculum intuentibus. Eodem anno sequenti perdita erat Normannia.

A^o domini M.ccccl^o. orta est discencio in regno Anglie propter omissionem Normannie, cujus facti reus, Willelmus Pole, Comes Suthfolk, capitur, et in Turri London. ponitur, tandem exilio condempnatur; set in mari captus est, et decollatur a quibusdam ignotis. Eodem anno tenuit Rex parliamentum a quindena pasche apud Leicester. Eodem tempore fuit grandis insurreccio in Cancia, in Estsex, et Suthsex, per Johannem Cade, capitaneum, cum magna multitudine ribaldorum et rusticorum apud Blakheth; ad quos destruendos destinatur Humfredus Stafford de Sarston⁸, miles, Willelmus Stafford, et multi alii nobiles; set per prodicionem aliorum a prae-fatis nebulonibus sunt nequiter interempti. In die Sanctorum Marci et Marcelliani,⁹ post istam victoriam, prefati nebulones London. accesserunt, ubi multa mala gesserunt. Eodem tempore Magister Willelmus Asku, Episcopus Sarum, apud Edyndon in comitatu Wilshire, in die apostolorum Petri et Pauli¹⁰ a ministris diaboli capitur et occiditur. Communitas vero

¹ Leland, Itinerary, i. 152, ed. Toulmin Smith. Cf. Archaeological Journal, xii. 180-90, with the text of Bishop Neville's decision on pp. 197-8.

² Cal. Pat. Rolls, Henry VI, iv. 416, v. 407.

³ 28th Oct.

⁴ A mistake; the date was 1437.

⁵ The date should be 1445.

⁶ The date should be 1446-7.

⁷ 23rd Feb.

⁸ An error for Grafton.

⁹ 18th June.

¹⁰ 29th June.

regni infamia replebatur, non timentes regem nec legem, set in pluribus locis statuerunt sibi capitaneos¹ ad spoliandum divites et personas ecclesiasticas. Vnde, audita morte Episcopi, tenentes sui tam apud Sarum quam apud Schirborn, insurrexerunt, et in maneria Episcopi depredaverunt. Tunc recordati sunt satellites iniquitatis, filii beliall, ministri diaboli quidam; quorum pedes veloces ad effundendam sanguinem, manus prone ad nequiciam. Illi, scilicet villani² de Schirborn, qui dudum contra dominum suum abbatem monasterii ibi pro quodam fonte insurrexerunt, qui quidem fons (fuit baptisterium)³ ex antiquo in prefato corpore monasterii consecrabatur, atque per papam Eugenium et regem Henricum atque ceteros magnates sic decretum erat in prefato loco permanere. Set capta opportunitate modo videbatur eis tempus aptum instare, quum lex a terra exulabatur, et nullus rex noscebatur eis, set solus magnus proditor Cancie, sub cuius tutela constituerunt Schirburnienses sibi capitaneum; cuius assensu omnes illi predones adierunt abbatem, si possent quovis modo eius animum emollescere. Qui plane eis renuit, sanctius estimans animam suam pro omnibus ponere quam priuilegium ecclesie sue omittere. Set satellites iniquitatis, in proposito suo versuto persistentes, fontem vnum in sua capella erexerunt inuito abbate, et munierunt cum custodibus phaleratis cum gladiis et fustibus, tanquam milites ante sepulcrum domini. Hoc facto post multas iniurias abbati et eius familiaribus factas constituerunt diem in festo sancti Prothi et Iacincti,⁴ in quo aut plane abbatis assensum optinerent, aut in manu forti illo inuito fontem suum exigerent. Statuto die convenerunt vndique viri sanguinum et dolosi cum tota fortitudine sua hora sexta diei in ecclesiam intrantes, nulli venerenciam exhibentes, set tanquam amentes cum gladiis et fustibus, proni ad madendum et spoliandum et occidendum; quibus visis et, consideratis diebus quia mali erant, consultum erat per abbatem et eius consiliarios vsque ad tempus esse cedendum, et concedendum eorum petitioni; quod et factum est. Quibus auditis merore constricti sunt, quia magis illuc convenerant ad spoliandum quam ad impetrandum. Postea consecratus est prefatus novus fons in capella in ecclesia parochiali per Ricardum Beauchamp,⁵ episcopum Sarum; quod fecit credendum est eo quod timore fecit, sicut et abbas concessit eis fontem coactus et inuitus, metuens

¹ William Wodeward or Berebriewer was 'Captain of Salisbury'; Cal. Pat. Rolls, Henry VI, v. 530.

² villam MS. The sentence is not completed.

³ Inserted by a later hand.

⁴ 11th Sept.

⁵ Translated to Salisbury on 15th Aug., 1450, and admitted to the temporalities on 1st Oct.

inuasionem gregis sue et destruccionem ouilis ad tempus eis concessit non perpetue mansurum. Sic et episcopus, videns eorum crudelitatem, et malum regimen vbique in regno, timens ne sibi eueniret sicut et antecessori Willelmo Asku euenerat, fauorem nimium eis exhibuit, eorum instigacionibus abbati et monachis se semper hausterum et crudelem vbique prebuit.

Anno domini M.cccclij. in die sancti Kenelmi¹ Comes Salopie incidit inconsulte in manus Francorum, vbi nequiter peremptus est, et applaudentibus de eo Francigenis sicut quondam Philisteis de Sampson. Eodem anno in die translacionis sancti Edwardi² Regis et confessoris natus est Edwardus, primogenitus Regis Henrici sexti, apud Westmonasterium.

Anno domini Mcccclv.^{to}, xxij^o die Maii³ apud sanctum Albanum, Rege ibidem presente, vbi per Ricardum ducem Eboraci occisi sunt dux Somerset, Comes Northumbr., et dominus Clifford cum multis aliis.

Anno domini Mcccclvj^{to} fuit annus indulgencie⁴ apud sanctum Jacobum. Eodem anno apparuit comata in mense Junii.

¹ 17th July.

² 13th October.

³ Supply fuit bellum before apud.

⁴ Originally Jubileus was written; but a later hand has scored it, and put indulgencie in the margin.

IX. WALTHAM ANNALS

1422—1447

These short Annals come from Cotton MS. Titus D. xv, ff. 54-7. They are clearly a monastic production, and the local references point to Essex, and perhaps to Waltham Abbey, as the place of writing. The original begins with the Conquest and is a compilation from various sources including the English Brut. The part from 1400 onwards is very brief, filling less than seven small leaves. For the reigns of Henry IV and Henry V the continuation is based chiefly on the English Brut; for the reign of Henry VI it seems to be more original; it was probably written in 1447. Three brief passages of the earlier part are peculiar enough to deserve quotation.

(a) Battle of Shrewsbury. Eodem anno, xij Kal. Augusti, feria sexta, in festo sancti Praxedis apud Salopiam, in campo, qui dicitur Oldefeld,¹ commissum est bellum inter Regem Henricum et Henricum Percy, vbi ceciderunt Henricus Percy et fere omnes generosi de comitatu Cestrie; ita quod vix remanebant tres milites, et septem armigeri in toto comitatu. Et ex parte Regis ceciderunt Comes Stafford, Dominus Walterus Blunt, signifer Regis, Dominus Nicholaus Hungerford, Dominus Iohannes Clyfton et duo fratres, n. n., Gouteley, et multi alii milites et nobiles generosi. Et de communibus ex vtraque parte ad estimacionem quinque milia. Hoc infortunium presignauit stella comata anno preterito. Versus:—

Mc. quater, I ter, obiit certamine Percy
Festo Praxedis, taurino nomine campo.

(b) Henry V and the Dauphin. Anno domini Mccccxv^o Rex Henricus tenuit consilium apud Westm., in quo inter dominos questionem mouens de iure et titulo quod antecessores sui habuerunt in Normannia, Vasconia et Aquitania; qui dederunt ei consilium vt Regi Francie mitteret pro iure suo. Quod audiens delphinus Francie in derisum Regi Anglie doleum plenum misit pilarum manualium. Quo viso Rex ait: 'Cum eis ad pilam volo ludere, si valeam.'

(c) Henry V at Harfleur. Hiis itaque peractis Rex cum suis in vigilia Assumpcionis beate Marie cum xv^o nauibus applicuit infra Seyne ad portum de Kedecaws, et sic transeundo ad villam de Harefleet, illamque obsidebat tam per mare quam per terram, ludendo cum

¹ Clearly an error for Bollefeld; cf. the verses at the end and p. 36 above.

Francigenis ad tenysiam; quorum responsio fuit Owt, Alas and Welaway. Et in die sancti Mauricii sociorumque eius sequente capta fuit Villa de Harfleet.

These two last passages are of interest as being obviously translated from the English Brut, pp. 375-6. In the Annals printed below some of the entries—as that for 1436—may come from a London Chronicle or from the Brut. The notice for the storm in 1444 closely resembles one in the Croyland Chronicle; those for 1433-4 and 1437 also resemble the Croyland Chronicle (p. 518) though in a less degree.

See further pp. 160-61 above.

Anno eodem,¹ die lune, vltimo die Augusti Henricus Wyndesore, filius Regis Henrici quinti, cepit regnare, puer ix mensium dierum xiiii etate.

Anno domini Mccccxxix^o, sexto die Nouembris, dominica die B., in festo sancti Leonardi apud Westm. ab Henrico Chicheley, Cant. Archiepiscopo, coronatus est Henricus sextus, filius Henrici quinti, A^o viij^o Regni sui incipiente vltimo die Augusti precedentis, anno sue etatis viij^o, iam habens in festo sancti Nicholai sequentis. Vnde versus:—

Flamine Romano crescet Britannicus honor,
Dum sibi cunctorum referatur laus populorum.
En! puer M. annis solium subibit honoris
C. quater, x. tercio, gallus ibit hiis minus vno.
Hinc canant colles per eum, quia subiugabuntur,
Qua perpendit homo crux sancta servetur et illi,
Duplex coronis caput exiget hiis sibi Rome,
Bruto pastore Iosaphat requies sibi vallis,
Virgo prius ac posterius Iuuenilis in Annis,
Posset eterni pro gestis gaudia celi,
Pax finalis erit de post per climata mundi,
Vnitaque fide simulac vnitur ouile.

In eadem coronacione filius ducis Austrie, cum multis aliis factus est miles.

Anno domini Mccccxxxj^o, septimo decimo Kal. Ianuar.,² G. littera dominicalis, Rex Henricus sextus apud Parys ab Henrico Beauford, Cardinalis Wyncestrie, in Regem Francie coronatus.

Anno domini Mccccxxij^o, die mensis Maii, feria iij^a, ab hora xij vsque ad horam terciam post nonam apparuit in firmamento conuersus orientem quedam stella lucidissima iuxta solem.

Anno domini Mccccxxij^o magnum fuit gelu, incipiens nocte Sancte

¹ i.e. 1432.

15th December.

Katerine virginis,¹ et durauit continue per x septimanas vsque ad festum sancte Iuliane virginis.²

Anno domini Mcccc xxxv^o ³ insurrexio comitatus Essex et Middelsex propter metum ducis Burgundie applicantis apud Maldon in Essex magno cum exercitu, in crastino sancti Iohannis Baptiste, scilicet die lune vocato le wode Munday vt dicebatur heronice; tamen vulgaris opinio fallebatur.

Eodem anno Dux Gloucestrie cum magno apparatu transfretauit in Flandriam, segetes patrie depopulauit et villam de Poperyng comburens, sed parum proficit. Eodem tempore destructa est obsidio ducis Burgundie apud Calesiam per dominum Iohannem Ratclyffe, tunc temporis capitaneum ville Calisie; quod presignatur stella lucidissima antedicta.

Anno domini Mccccxxvj^o ceciderunt turre archus pontis London funditus in Tamesiam. Eodem anno, tercio die Ianuar., feria quinta apud Bermondessey iuxta London. obiit Katerina, Regina Anglie, et sepulta est in capella sancte Marie apud Westm.

Anno domini millesimo cccccxxvij^o fuit autumpnus aquosus. In sequenti anno cepit fames valida in Anglia durans per duos annos. Ita quod in quibusdam locis regni modicus frumenti vendebatur pro xxx d., in quibusdam locis pro iij s., in quibusdam locis pro xl d. Et modicus ordeï pro ij s. iij d. Et modicus pisarum pro xvij d. Et in quibusdam locis regni communis vulgus collegerunt radices filicum, quos siccantes et molentes, inde fecerunt sibi panes, vt dicebatur.⁴ Sed in fine postremi anni modicus frumenti vendebatur pro viij d. Laudetur Deus.

Anno domini M^occccxxxix^o ventus fuit validus, vocatus Southwest-wynd, feria quarta, hora septima post nonam nocte sancti Iuliani confessoris,⁵ domos euertens, arbores prosternens, et multa mira et inaudita faciens.

Anno domini M^occccxlxij^o, in die purificationis beate Marie⁶ combustum est campanile Monasterii de Waltham ad crucem cum choruscatione fulminis.

Anno domini M^occccxliij^o, in vigilia purificationis beate Marie diuersis locis Anglie auditus fuit tonitrus terribilis cum choruscatione horribili; in quibus ecclesia de Baldok circa horam octauam in mane, ¹ 25th November. The reference is to the great frost of 1434-5, which began on St. Catherine's Day and lasted till St. Valentine's Day (Gregory's Chronicle, p. 178; Chron. London, p. 137).

² 18th Feb.

³ The date should clearly be 1436, which is the date of the siege of Calais; in that year 25th June fell on a Monday.

⁴ Cf. Brut, p. 507.

⁵ 27th Jan.

⁶ 2nd Feb. 1443-4.

ecclesia de Walden circa decimam, et vna ecclesia in Cancia conquassate fuerunt. Campanile sancti Pauli London. circa horam secundam post nonam, et campanile ecclesie de Kyngeston super Tamesiam combusta.¹

Eodem anno, xvij Kal. Octobr., in festo exaltacionis sancte crucis² Rex Henricus comitem de Stafford fecit ducem Bokynamie, comitem Huntyngdon ducem Exonie, Comitem de Somersett ducem Somersett, comitem de Dorsett marchionem de Dorsett, comitem de Suff. marchionem de Suff., et dominum Talbott comitem Salopie.

Anno domini Millesimo cccxlv^o, quinto Kal. Marci, in crastino sancti Mathei Apostoli,³ incepit parliamentum apud Westm., in quo Rex Henricus fecit comitem de Warewyk ducem de Warewyk. Inde infra breue orta est dissencio inter ducem de Bokyngham et ducem de Warewyk pro sessione in parlamento quis eorum videretur esse maior; sed statim sopita est dissencio Regis adminiculo.

Eodem anno, quinto Idus Aprilis,⁴ feria quinta, hora secunda post nonam Margareta, filia Regis Sicilie, [maritata est] a Magistro Wilhelmo Ascue, Sar. episcopo, in prioratu' canonicorum de Tychefeld ordinis sancti Augustini in Hampshire.

Eodem anno, xvij Kal. Iunii,⁵ die pentecost finiente tanta et inaudita tempestas tonitrus chorcacionis, et pluuiā cepit ab hora viij, durans vsque ad mediam noctem; ita quod populorum Anglie corda terribiliter concussit.

Eodem anno, tercio Kal. Iunii,⁶ die dominica apud Westm. a Iohanne Stafford, Cant. Archiepiscopo, Margareta, filia Regis Sicilie, in Regnam Anglie coronata est.

Anno domini Mccccxlvj^o, sexto Idus Aprilis,⁷ in vigilia Ramis palmarum finiuit parliamentum durans anno integro, ebdomadis sex, diebusque duobus; in quo plurima statuta valde necessaria ad commune proficuum tocius Regni Anglie fuerunt edita.

Eodem anno, xvij die Decembr., media nocte, die dominica, in yeme tanta erat chorcacio et tonitrus horribilis, que corda populorum mirabiliter perterrituit. Vnde vulgariter dicebatur: Wynter thunder bredeth wonder.

Anno domini Mccccxlvj^o, x die Febr. incepit parliamentum apud Buriam in comitatu Suff.; in quo parlamento, xxij die eiusdem, obiit Humfridus, Dux Gloucestrie, apud Buriam. Et secundo die Marci

¹ Cf. for a similar account Croyland Chronicle, p. 520.

² 14th Sept.

³ 25th Feb.

⁴ 9th April: this was the date on which Margaret landed at Portsmouth, she was not married till the 22nd April.

⁵ 16th May.

⁶ 30th May.

⁷ 5th April.

sequente apud Sanctum Albanum in comitatu Bedford sepultus est ; et finiuit parliamentum xvij die Marcii proximo sequente. Eodem anno obiit papa Eugenius quartus, xxij die Febr., scilicet feria quinta Cinerum in vigilia Mathie Apostoli, et sepultus est die Sabbati sequente ; qui sedit annis sexdecim. Et penultimo die eiusdem mensis, scilicet feria ij* prime ebdomade quadragesime sequente, electus fuit papa Nicholaus quintus. Et viij die Aprilis sequente in vigilia pasche obiit Henricus, Episcopus Wynton. et Cardinalis Sabinensis. Et quinto die Augusti sequente obiit Johannes Holand, dux Exonie, et sepultus est apud Sanctam Katerinam iuxta Turrim London.

Finito libro sit laus et gloria Christo. Amen.

X. GLOUCESTER ANNALS

1449—1469

As noted on pp. 161-2 above these short Annals come at the end of a chronicle which ends with 1422 (Cotton MS. Domitian A. iv. ff. 246-56).

The whole (with the exception of the final note on the dispute at Lanthony) is written in the same hand, and not earlier than 1469. The first part is a worthless compilation; its Gloucester character is marked by notices of the Parliaments held there in 1378 and 1406; on the former occasion Richard II is said to have spent some time in the Abbey. Under 1403 the Battle of Shrewsbury is referred to as 'graue bellum Salopie in campo qui dicitur Bolefelde'.¹ The chronicle breaks off at 1422 on f. 254^{ro}, and resumes at 1449 on f. 255^{ro}. As regards the story of Lanthony Priory with which it ends, it must clearly be earlier than 1467, in which year Henry Deane, the future Archbishop of Canterbury, was certainly Prior of Lanthony.² It has been stated that Deane was appointed in the first year of Edward IV.³ If this is correct the quarrel of Schoyer and Heyward would belong to the summer of 1461. Edward IV visited Gloucester in September of that year, and might then have intervened in the dispute. But as the dispute began on 28th and 29th August and apparently lasted eight months before Schoyer was compelled to submit, a later date is preferable. Possibly it was part of the same quarrel as that assigned in the main text to 1463, when Edward IV visited Gloucester. In any case the Note was written long after the events which it describes. Heyward occurs as Prior of Lanthony in 1457⁴; I have found no other reference to Schoyer.

For a further note on the contents of this chronicle see pp. 161-2 above.

Anno domini M.cccc.xlix. Reginaldus Bowleys, quondam abbas Glouc., missus fuit ab Henrico Rege sexto cum aliis diuersis dominis, tam spiritualibus quam temporalibus, quasi ambassiatores et nuncios ad coronacionem imperatoris apud Akun, pro diuersis negociis domini Regis et regni Anglie. Qui cum in Angliam reuersus esset, a populo et communitate Glouc. proditor publice appellatus et vociferatus est, pro eo, vt dicebatur, Franciam totam pro quadam summa pecunie vendidisset. Tunc surrexit communitas Glouc., et manerium de Wyneyarde totaliter spoliauerunt, et bona omnia, que inuenire poterant, asportauerunt. Feras et cuniculos cum agnis et columbis totaliter destruxerunt et comederunt. Uinum, quod in celario abbatis erat, biberunt, et quod supererat effuderunt vel in vasi apportauerunt. Deinde maneria eorum et quod in eis inuenire poterant inter eos

¹ See p. 36 above.

² Monasticon, vi. 127.

³ Archaeological Journal, xvii. 256, but no authority is given.

⁴ Monasticon, vi. 127.

diuiserunt. Et sic de bonis monasterii fecissent, nisi conuentus cum manu forte et bono auxilio laicorum et forestariorum eis restitissent.

Anno domini M.cccc. sexagesimo tercio surrexit communitas de Schira Glouc. et villam Glouc. intrauerunt cum manu forti, et vnum de Balliuis, nomine Johannes Dodyng, infra abbathiam latitantem post multas perscrutaciones in infirmaria monachorum inuenerunt, et vulnerauerunt; et sic eum sanguinem distillantem per claustrum et eciam per ecclesiam sine timore dei cum magno strepitu deduxerunt, et sic ad altam crucem predictę ville, vbi eum crudeliter occiderunt, et postea decapitauerunt, et caput eius super portam occidentalem suspenderunt.

In vigilia apostolorum Simonis et Iude. Et infra paucos dies iterum villam intrauerunt, et quam plurimos burgenses predictę ville quesierunt et non inuenerunt. Quod si inuenissent eos morti penitus tradidissent. Set postea Comite¹ de Warwyke adueniente, et pulcra verba eis promittente, et petitionem eorum concedente, pacati ad propria redierunt. Postmodum vero superueniente Rege Edwardo cum multis nobilibus viris et armatis, quosdam de plebi communitatis iussit suspendi, et quosdam iussit decapitari, et capita eorum super portas Glouc. iussit poni. Et facta est tranquillitas magna.

Anno domini Mcccclx. fuit bellum apud Northampton inter Regem Henricum sextum et Ricardum ducem Eboraci et comitem de Warwyke et alios multos,² qui fuerunt in bello predicto contra predictum regem Henricum volentes eum deponere et predictum ducem in Regem constituere. In quo bello occisi fuerunt dux de Bokyngham, dominus de Schewesbury cum multis aliis generosis, qui fuerunt ex parte Regis Henrici.

Anno domini M.cccc. sexagesimo nono in vigilia³ sancti Iacobi Apostoli, tempore Regis Edwardi quarti, fuit bellum apud Banbury inter Anglicos et Wallicos in campo vocato Saxonfelde. In quo bello occisi fuerunt multi Wallici, qui venerant cum domino de Hereberde in manu forti. Set diuino auxilio captus fuit ibi dominus illorum cum fratribus suis, et sic perductus ad villam de Northampton accepit capitalem sententiam coram communitate totius Anglie.⁴ Nam ad istum bellum surrexit communitas de Kente, et communitas ex boriali parte Anglie ad extinguendum istum dominum de Hereberde, quia homo crudelis erat paratus ad omne crimen, et, vt dicebatur, cogitabat subuertere regnum Anglie et eam totaliter spoliare. Set iudicio dei percussus destructus est cum adiutoribus suis. Nam illo tempore

¹ Comes, MS.

² aliis multis, MS.

³ 24th July; the true date was 26th July.

⁴ On 28th July.

proditores multi fuerunt vocati, videlicet Comes de Ryuers cum filiis suis, et dominus de Southwyke, comes de Devonshyre, cum multis aliis.

Anno domini Mcccc. sexagesimo nono, xij^o Kalendas Septembris¹ decapitatus fuit in ciuitate Coventrensi Comes de Ryuers, thesaurarius Anglie, cum filio suo, pater Isabelle Regine, coniugis et consortis Regis Edwardi quarti.

Anno domini Mcccc. sexagesimo nono, xvj^o Kalendas Septembris² decapitatus fuit dominus de Sowthewyke, Comes de Devynschyre, quia, vt dicebatur, consenserat in necem ducis de Clarencie fratris Regis Edwardi quarti, et eciam in mortem Ricardi, Comitis de Warewyke, cum domino de Hereberde, qui cogitabat extinguere eos. Set iudicio dei percussi prius fuerunt decapitati.

³Anno domini M. cccc. sexagesimo⁴ die sancti Augustini⁵ ante festum decollationis Johannis Baptiste⁶ facta est magna discordia inter Johannem Schoyare priorem Lanthonie et Johannem Heywarde nuper priorem eiusdem loci. Propter quod surrexerunt fforestarii vi et armis ex parte Johannis Schoyare ad roborandam partem illius. Ex alia parte communitas Glouc. cum generosis prope manentibus in auxilium Johannis Heywarde. Factus est magnus conflictus in vtrasque partes. Vnde conuenientibus in vnum apud Lanthoniam forestarii et communitas Glouc. multi vulnerati fuerunt ex ambabus partibus, et plurimi occisi, vt dicebatur. Vnde canonici loci predicti pertimescentes de loco suo discesserunt, et ad comitem de Warwyke fugerunt, et bona monasterii secum asportauerunt. Sicque apud castellum de Hanley per octo menses commorantes religionem et diuinum seruicium ibidem explentes, propter timorem forestariorum sui prioris, videlicet J. Schoyer, non ausi sunt in domo propria commanere. Set postea predictus prior J. Schoyere per regem Edwardum quartum ad domum propriam redire compulsus est. Sic post longam inquietacionem inter ipsum et Johannem Heywarde, nuper priorem, et magnarum erium expansionem congregati sunt iterum canonici predicti domus, et se cum omnibus que habebant ad propria sunt reuersi. Set iste Schoyer in malicia sua perseuerans quosdam ex canonicis iterum carcerauit. Qua ex causa timens populum, qui eum non dilexerunt set magis maledixerunt, monasterium suum de Lanthoniam spoliauit et bona secum asportauit.

¹ This would be 21st August, but the true date was 12th August.

² 17th August, correct. ³ In another hand.

⁴ The date is imperfect; probably it was not later than 1463, but see above.

⁵ 28th August. ⁶ 29th August.

XI. COLLECTIONS OF A YORKIST PARTISAN

1447—1452

Cotton Roll ii. 23 at the British Museum contains a Collection of Political Poems and other pieces relating to the troubles of 1447-52. In all there are twenty-two Articles, viz. 1. Particulars as to Suffolk's Indictment. 2. Verses against the Duke of Suffolk—1448. 3. A Warning to King Henry—1449. 4. 'Now is the Fox driven to hole'—Feb. 1450. 5. A charge against Suffolk. 6. Note on Humphrey Stafford. 7. Petition of the Commons of Kent—June 1450. 8. On Bishop Boothe—1447 or 1448. 9. A Prophecy: 'When the Cocke in the North.' 10. A Prophecy: 'S. mysed in myndes and marke per a P., S. set by himself savand a J.' 11. Notes on taxes, &c. 12. Commercial grievances. 13. Names of the Duke of Gloucester's household—1447. In tergo: 14. Names of persons indicted at Rochester—August, 1450. 15. Note on Jack Cade. 16. Names of persons slain in 1450. 17. York's Bill to the King—Oct. 1450. 18. 'The Rote is ded'—Nov.—Dec. 1449. 19. Names of French prisoners taken at Whitby—Nov. 1451. 20. Events in Kent—March-May, 1452. 21. A Prophecy: 'The prophecy professid and I-pight, Of maiden Sibille and many mo.' (about 300 lines). 22. A Prophecy: 'When Sunday goop by E., D., and C.' (Dominical Letters for 1449, 1450, and 1451.)

There are thus: 5 Political Poems, (Nos. 2, 3, 4, 8, and 18); 4 Prophecies (Nos. 9, 10, 21, and 22); and 13 Documents and Notes (Nos. 1, 5, 6, 7, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 19, and 20). The Political Poems have all been printed in Wright's Political Poems and Songs and elsewhere.¹ Of the Prophecies, No. 9 is the same as the third section of the first prophecy in The Whole Prophetie of Scotland (Bannatyne edition, pp. 6-9), see also Early Scottish Prophecies, pp. 18-20, E.E.T.S.; in various forms it is of common occurrence.² There is a Latin version of it in Cotton MS. Vespasian E. viii. f. 132. Of the prose Notes and Documents, No. 1 comes from the Rolls of Parliament (v. 177); Nos. 5 and 6 were printed in Archaeologia, xxix. 325; No. 7 was given in a somewhat different form by Stow—Annales, 389-90; Nos. 13, 14, and 15 were printed by Sir Henry Ellis in Original Letters, 2nd Series, i. 108-9, 112-13; No. 17 is given from other copies by Stow—Annales, 395, where it is incorrectly assigned to 1452—and in Paston Letters, No. 143; No. 20 was printed by Dr. Gairdner in Paston Letters, i. 335-6. The majority of these prose pieces are therefore not new. But since as printed they are scattered in various places, and the interest of the Collection is so much enhanced by their collocation, it seems useful to bring them all (with the exception of No. 1) together here.

To speak more particularly of the several pieces.

ARTICLES 5 and 6 call for no comment.

ARTICLE 7 is a copy of a Bill circulated by the Commons of Kent; it shows a good deal of textual variation from the copy of the same document given by Stow (S.). The Bill has a general resemblance to Clauses

¹ See further pp. 242-4 above.

² See p. 236 above.

14 to 18 of a 'Proclamation of Jack Cade', dated 4th June, 1450 (also preserved by Stow, and printed in Three Fifteenth Century Chronicles, pp. 94-9—noted as T). The first 13 clauses of the Proclamation (it has 22 clauses) agree very closely with a Bill, on a ragged sheet of paper, preserved at Magdalen College, Oxford; this Bill, which is perhaps one of the copies originally circulated, has 14 clauses and ends with these verses:

God be our guide and then schull we spede,
 Who so evur say nay, ffalse for ther money reulethe,
 Trewth for his tales spellethe,
 God seende vs a ffayre day. Away, traytours, away.

See Hist. MSS. Comm. Eighth Report, Appendix I, pp. 266-7. In some places the Bill in the Cotton Roll resembles the Proclamation more closely than it does Stow's copy. The allegation that Suffolk and his affinity were responsible for the death of John Beaufort is peculiar to this copy, and is extraordinary as a specimen of the random charges made by Suffolk's enemies.

ARTICLE 11 consists of Notes which are more curious than important.

ARTICLE 12 is the most important piece, which is entirely new. When found in this place it seems to show that Commercial Grievances had their share in leading to the unpopularity of the Lancastrian government.¹ It is useful for comparison with the Libel of English Policy.

ARTICLE 13, as Ellis observed, is curious for the preponderance of Welsh names; but Gloucester had large estates in Wales.

ARTICLE 14 is here dated August, 1451 (29th Henry VI). But no doubt it belongs to 1450, when on 17th-19th August James Gresham wrote to John Paston²: 'This same Moneday [17th Aug.] goth my Lord Chaunceller and my lord of Buk. into Kent to set up an oier and determiner at Rorchestre.' However, the hearing seems to have been prolonged into September,³ and so would have fallen in part within the 29th year. The Article has a further inaccuracy in styling Kemp 'Bysshop of Canterbury'; he was not finally translated to that see till Sept. 1451. Besides the Bishops, Boothe of Lichfield (or Chester) and Lyhert of Norwich, who owed their advancement to Suffolk, and prominent ministers like Dudley, Say, Hoo, and Daniell, the list includes many comparatively humble individuals, who held offices in the royal household. It is noteworthy how many of them were concerned with the financial and legal administration of the government. In the Parliament of Jan. 1451 the Commons put up a Bill against certain persons charged 'of misbehaving about your Royal person and in other places'; the list then given includes most of those indicted at Rochester, but adds some others (Rolls of Parliament, v. 216). The numbers against the names may refer to charges in the indictments.

ARTICLE 15 gives particulars as to Cade, which are found here alone.

ARTICLE 16, besides its bald notes of well-known incidents, refers obscurely to troubles in Worcestershire and Flint.

ARTICLE 17. 'York's Bill' does not show so much textual variation from the other copies as does the 'Petition of the Commons'. It is perhaps a little closer to the copy in the Paston Letters (P.) than to the

¹ See p. 235 above.

² Paston Letters, i. 87, ii. 161, 162; cf. Cal. Pat. Rolls, v. 388, for the commission dated 1st Aug. 1450.

³ Cf. Foedera, xi. 276, a patent sealed by Kemp at Rochester on 11th Sept. 1450.

one given by Stow (S.), which more resembles a copy (B.) at Beverley (Beverley MSS., p. 33 Hist. MSS. Commission).

ARTICLE 19 refers to an attempted French invasion in Nov. 1451, which is briefly recorded in one London Chronicle: 'And this yere was sir Pieres de Brasil, and the bastard of Orliaunce, and Manypeny taken.'¹

ARTICLE 20. Dr. Gairdner describes this as giving 'the most minute account of the encampment of the Duke of York at Dartford' in March, 1452.² Some of the other Notes are rather obscure; the latest belongs to May, 1452, and is the latest thing in the Collection.

The character of Article 12 suggests that the collector was a London citizen; Articles 5 and 11 are notes which might naturally be made by some one of mercantile interests. Some other references, as for instance the conclusion of Article 20, point to its London origin.

ARTICLE 5.

The Duke of Suffolk hath married his nese, His Suster Dowghter, to þe Capdawe³ &c: And yaf hym w^t here the Revenewes þat come fro Bordiaux, that is to wete vj⁰⁰ townes Wyne yerly, v. C. li. &c. in mony, þe whiche my lord of Gloucetter hadde of yifte of þe kyng duryng his life &c. Memorandum. The Kyng is xxvj M. li. in det, and he may dispend but xxxiiij M.; of the which the Kyng hath no more in hond but v M. li., and his expenses comyth yerly xxxij M.

ARTICLE 6.

At Tonebrigge fast by Sevenoke þer was Stafford⁴ slayn þe purs-day next before myssomer.⁵

ARTICLE 7.

These ben þe desires of the trewe comyns of your soueraign lord þe Kyng.

First the Chaptayn of þe same Comyns deserith the welfare of oure soueraign lord þe Kyng, and of all his trewe lordes spirituall and temporall, desiryng of our soueraigne lord and all his trewe counseill to take ageyn⁶ all his demayngnes, and he shall þen⁷ raign lyke a Kyng Riall as he is born our trewe cristen Kyng anoynted. And who saith⁸ þe contrary we woll all lyue and dye in that quarell.⁹

Also desiryng his trewe Comyns þat he woll voyde all the false progeny and afynyte of the Duke of Southefolke, the whiche ben opynly knowyn traitours, and they to be ponysshed after custome¹⁰ and lawe of the¹¹ lond. And to take abowte hym a nobill persone, þe trewe

¹ Nicolas, London Chronicle, 137.

² Paston Letters, i. 335.

³ Jean de Foix, Captal de Buch, and Earl of Kendal, married to Elizabeth de la Pole.

⁴ Sir Humphrey Stafford of Grafton.

⁵ 18th June, 1450.

⁶ said soueraigne Lord, and of the true Lords of his Councell, he to take in S.

⁷ that he may S. ⁸ who so will say S.

⁹ quarrell as his true liege men S.

¹⁰ after the custome S. ¹¹ this S.

blode of þe Reame,¹ þat is to sey the hye and myghty prince þe Duke of Yorke, late exiled from our soueraigne lordes presens of the false traitour Duke² of Southfolke and his affinite, and take to yow³ þe myghty prince the Duke⁴ of Excetter, Duke of Bokyngham, Duke of⁵ Northefolke, Erlys⁶ and barons of this londe: and þen shall he be þe Richest Kyng cristen.

Also desirith his trewe Comyns⁷ punysshement of⁸ the fals traitours, the which contreuyn⁹ and ymagyned the deeth of our excellent¹⁰ prince þe Duke of Glowcetter, the whiche is to myche to reherse, the whiche Duke was opynly proclamyd at þe Parlement of Bury a traytour,¹¹ vpon þe which quarell we purpose¹² to lyue and dye that it is false.

Also the Duke of Exceter,¹³ and our holy fader the Cardenall of Wynchester, the nobill princes the Duke of Somerset,¹⁴ the Duke of Warreweke,¹⁵ delyuered and distroyed by the same meanys.¹⁶

Also the Realme of Fraunce,¹⁷ the Duchie of Normandy, Gasguyn, and Guyen, Angoy, and Mayn¹⁸ lost by the same¹⁹ traytours, and our trewe lordes and knyghtes, Squyers and good yemen²⁰ lost and sold²¹ or they went ouer the See,²² which is gret pite and gret losse²³ to our soueraigne lord and distruction to his Realme.²⁴

Also desirith the Capteyn with the commons of Kente,²⁵ that all the extorcions may²⁶ be leid down, that is to sey, the grete extorcion of²⁷ grene wex, that is falsly vsed to þe perpetuall distruction of the

¹ about his Noble person, the true lords of his royal blood of this his realme S. his noble person his trew blode of his ryall realme T.

² presence by the motion and stirring of the traitorous and false disposed the Duke S.; lords person by the noysing of the fals traytore the Duke T.

³ take to yow om. S.; Also to take about his person, T.

⁴ Princes and Dukes S. ⁵ Duke of om. S.

⁶ and all the Earles S.; and his trewe Erls T.

⁷ the captaine and commons S. ⁸ upon S., T. ⁹ conterfetyd T.

¹⁰ of the high and mightfull excellent S., T.

¹¹ the which Duke was proclaymed as traitour S.

¹² purpose all, S.; purpose us T. ¹³ John Holland, d. 5th Aug. 1447.

¹⁴ John Beaufort, d. 1444. ¹⁵ Henry Beauchamp, d. 1445.

¹⁶ Item the Duke of Excester, our holy father the Cardinall, the Noble Prince Duke of Warwicke, and S.; also owre fadyr the cardenall, the good Duke of Exeter, the nobyll prynce the Duke of Warwyke, the wiche ware delyveryd by the same meny untrew T.

¹⁷ Fraunce lost T. ¹⁸ Anjoy demayn T.

¹⁹ Maine, were deliuered and lost by the meanes of the said S.

²⁰ many a good yeoman S.; many good yemen T. ²¹ wer sold T.

²² ouer the See om. S., T.

²³ pitie to heare, of the great and grievous losse S.

²⁴ Lord and his Realme S.; lord and to all the realme T.

²⁵ captaine and Commons S.; Item they desyre T.

²⁶ extorsiners myght T.; extortions, used daily among the common people, might S.

²⁷ grete extorcion of om. S., T.

Kynges liege men and the Comons¹ of Kente with out provision² our Soueraigne lorde and his trewe Counsell.

Also in takyng whete and other Grayne, Beeff, Moton, and other³ vitail, the whiche is vnportable⁴ to the said Commons, with oute breff provision⁵ of our⁶ soueraigne lorde and his trewe counsell, pey may no longer bere hit : and also vnto þe statute of laborers and grete extorcioners beyng in Kente, that they be punysshed, and þat is to say,⁷ the traytours,⁸ Slegge,⁹ Crowmere,¹⁰ Ysele,¹¹ and Robert Est.¹²

ARTICLE II.

The summe of the dayes in the yere is iijc. iij.^{xx} v.

Sum of the xvth penny and of the xth and all, is in Inglond xxxviiij^m li. iijc., iij. li. xviiij. ob. And þerof is alowed to þe Collectors þerof iij^c li xxij li. vjs. viiij. ; and so þer levith clerely Summa xxxvij^m li. ix^c xxxij li. xiiij. ix. ob.¹³

The Quinte of the Dymes of Clergye in the province of Canterbury is xvj.^m vc. iij.^{xx} and x. li. xviijs. ijd. ob. Quinte of the Dymes of province of York is ij^m iij^c v. li. xijs. iv. d. and q^{ter}.

Summa of the xvth peny of the lay fee, and of þe dymes of Clergy of Inglond is summa lvj.^m viij^c x. li. v. s. iiiij. d. q^a.

In Anglia sunt ecclesie parochiales xlv^m et xj.¹⁴ Et ville sunt lij mill. iiiij.^{xx} Et feoda militum iij.^{xx} M. et xv, quibus sunt in manibus religiosorum xxvij Mill. xv.

Comitatus vero sunt in Anglia xxxvj &c.¹⁵

ARTICLE 12.

Hit is needfull for to knowe how the money, golde and silver gooth in to dyuerse Raimys and Contrays.¹⁶ And how for to let hit that it shulde not passe. And how to gete hit agayn. The [sic] is þe sewrist and the most profetable way to Remedy hit, that is to whete for to set

¹ the kings true commons S. ; the trew comyns T.

² Kent. Also the Kings bench, the which is greedefull to the shire of Kent without prouision of S. ; Kent. Also the extorsiners of the Kynges Benche, the which is ryght chargeable to all the comyns with owten provysyon of T.

³ all other S. ⁴ importable hurt, T.

⁵ with out the breefe prouision S. ; with out provysyon T. ⁶ our said S.

⁷ extortioners, which is to say S. ; extorsiners of Kent, that is to sey T.

⁸ false traitors S. ; the traytours om. T.

⁹ Stephen Slegge, Cal. Pat. Rolls, v. 382.

¹⁰ William Crowmer, the Sheriff.

¹¹ Isle S., T. ; William Isle, Cal. Pat. Rolls, v. 287, 382.

¹² Yeoman of the Crown and escheator of Kent, id. v. 471.

¹³ There is an error, either in the gross amount or in the allowance.

¹⁴ A common exaggeration.

¹⁵ It should be 37, Cheshire, Durham, and Monmouth not counting.

¹⁶ Cf. Libel of English Policy ap. Wright, Pol. Poems, ii. 174-6.

your mony at doubull the valowie that it gooth, and that shall cause al marchandes to bryng as myche money as they may che vesshe.

The seconde griff is for that the woll and ffell hath course and passage oute of the Ream, wherfore all Straungers take but litell reward to bye oure Inglisshe clothe, but make hit theym selff.¹

The Remedy is this : let ordeyne that no woll ne ffell passe not, in payne of forfeiture of the good. And the persooone to make ffine w^t the Kyng &c.

And who so euer speke for the part to excuse hym is to be take culpabull of treson, and neuer to haue credens. And than woll all Strangers be gladd to take oure [woll] after þat hit is worth.

The thridde articull and full grevous is this that the Lombardes, Esterlinges &c ben suffred to abide so long within the londe, and to vtter ther good at þ^{er} own lust.² And þ^{er} vnder þey enproche þe Kynges Customs and engrose þe gold and send hit over the See and gete vpon the nobull xvjd, that is iiij^s at the pounde, the whiche hath made the Reeme full bare of gold.

þe Remedy of this cause is this. Let ordeyn that all Straungers of all Countrys, to what porte euer they dryve and come, that þey shall sell ther goodes to Marchaundes of the same porte, and to take clothe and other good &c. And the said Marchaundes to certiffye the summe of the good to the Kynges Custymere. And so the Kyng oure Soueraine Lorde justly shall haue his right and grete Richese, and full mony Riche Marchaundes in his londe. And who that may be founde brekyng the Statutes, he that certyfieth to haue halff the contempes.

ARTICLE 13.

These ben the names of the Duke of Glowcetteris maynye that were taken at Bery, and sent in to dyuerse places to preson.

To London ³ :—

Sir Henry Owgan. Thomas Harbert.⁴ Thomas Wryrot. Griffith ap Daid ap Thomas. Yevan ap Jankyn.

To Barkamstede :—

Jankyn thaylde. Jankyn Loyde Wogan. John Wogan.

To Redyng :—

William Wogan. Evan ap Jankyn ap Rise. Will. ap John ap dd. ap Th. lloyd.

¹ Cf. Libel of English Policy ap. Wright Pol. Poems, ii. 176, and 284 (the later poem).

² Id. ii. 177.

³ In the original the names are written in a column, each group being bracketed with the name of the place against it.

⁴ Pardoned, 14th July, 1447, Cal. Pat. Rolls, v. 74.

To Ledys :—

Will. Wogan. Will. ap Thomas son of Robt. ap Ryse. Henry Wogan.

To Northwich :—

Alen appe Meredith ap Philipp Madock. Ries appe Dd. appe Thomas. Thomas Jankyne appe Ries.

To Wallyngford :—

Owen Don. Hugo Gunere. Hugo Bennooth.

To Gilford :—

John Eyvon. Walter Burthull. Hugo ap Thomas.

To Southehampton :—

John ap Ries. Ric. ap Robert. Will. ap John.

Into þe Kynges Benche :—

Dd. ap Thomas. Hugo ap Thomas. Griffith ap Nicollasson.

To Brystowe :—

Sir Robert Were. Sir Roger Chamberleyn.¹ Sir John Cheyne.

To Wynchestre :—

Richard Middleton.¹ Henr. Chechilley. Arteys.² Richard Nedam.³

To Notyngham :—

Morgan. Bokelond.⁴ Milborn.⁵

To Northampton :—

Bassyngborn. Wyeld.⁶ Shaffeld.

ARTICLE 14.

These ben the namys that were endited at Rowchester afore the Cardinall of York, Bysshop of Canterbury,⁷ and the Duke of Bokyngham &c., in the feste of the Assumpcion⁸ of oure Lady, and in festo Laurencii⁹ anno Regis Henrici xxix^o.¹⁰

John Sutton de Duddely¹¹ in Com. Stafford: Alias dictus John Sutton, miles de London 2. John Trevelyian,¹² nuper de London, armiger, 2. Alicia de la Poole, nuper vxor Willelmi Poole, Ducis Suff., nuper de Newelme¹³ in Comitatu Oxon., 2. Johannes Polfford,¹⁴ nuper de London, armiger, 2. Thomas Kent¹⁵ de London, gentyllman: Alias

¹ Pardoned, 14th July, 1447, Cal. Pat. Rolls, v. 68.

² Artus de Cursy, pardoned, u. s. ³ Or Nedeham, pardoned, u. s.

⁴ William Bokelond, pardoned, 14th Sept., id. v. 104.

⁵ Richard Milborne, cf. id. v. 166.

⁶ Thomas Wyld, pardoned, 1st Sept., id. v. 104.

⁷ Kemp was not translated to Canterbury until Sept. 1451.

⁸ 15th August.

⁹ 10th August.

¹⁰ As to the date see p. 359 above.

¹¹ Treasurer, afterwards Lord Dudley (Dict. Nat. Biog. xvi. 107).

¹² In the King's household, Usher of the Receipt in the Exchequer (Cal. Pat. Rolls, v. 79, 130, 251).

¹³ Ewelme.

¹⁴ or Pulford, yeoman of the crown (id. v. 43, 241).

¹⁵ Clerk of the Council, and secondary in the privy seal office (id. v. 83, 416).

dictus T. K., clericus consilii domini Regis, 2. John Penycol,¹ nuper de London, armiger 2. Thomas Hoo² de Hastyng in Com. Sussex of 2. Reginaldus,³ abbas sancti Petri Gloucestrie of 2. Jacobus Fynys,⁴ dominus de Say, 1. T. Stanley,⁵ miles, of 1. Edmund Hongurford,⁶ of 1. Will. Miners,⁷ armiger, 1. Edmund Hampdene,⁷ miles, 1. John Hall,⁸ armiger, 1. Thomas Daniell,⁹ armiger, 1. Thomas Thorp,¹⁰ gentelman, 1. John Blakeney,¹¹ gentelman, 1. Dominus Johannes Forstkew,¹² of 1, miles. Johannes Gargrave,¹³ 1. Walter Liard,¹⁴ episcopus Norwic., 1. Ric. Woodville,¹⁵ dominus de Ryuers, 1. Robert Manfeld,¹⁶ armiger, 1. Maister John Somers,¹⁷ 1. Edward Grymston,¹⁸ armiger. Willelmus Boothe,¹⁹ episcopus Cestrie, 1. Johannes Stanley,²⁰ armiger, 1. Palmere,²¹ Tressam,²² Faumpage,²³ Gryswold.²⁴ 2, Hampton,²⁵ esquire, Rest. 2, Gargrave²⁶ in the towr.

ARTICLE 15.

This was the name of the Capteyn of Kente, John Cade, Aliis dictus M. John Aylemere, ffysysyon. And he was gayly beseyn in Skarlet. And wedded a Squiers dowghter of Taundede.²⁷

¹ Penycoke, esquire of the King's body, and escheator in Lincolnshire (id. v. 150, 211).

² Lord Hoo, formerly chancellor of Normandy.

³ Reginald Bowles or Bowers, see p. 162 above.

⁴ Murdered in London, 4th July, 1450.

⁵ Controller of the King's household (id. iii. 286, v. 220).

⁶ Held various offices in the royal service (id. v. 213, 274, 285).

⁷ Ushers of the Chamber (id. v. 84, 130).

⁸ Possibly the Salisbury merchant (Dict. Nat. Biog. xxiv. 101).

⁹ Remembrancer of the Exchequer (Cal. Pat. Rolls, v. 33, 405).

¹⁰ Treasurer's Remembrancer (id. v. 129).

¹¹ King's sergeant, and clerk in the Mint (id. v. 57, 563).

¹² Fortescue, the Chief Justice.

¹³ Marshal of the Marshalsea (id. vi. 7).

¹⁴ Or Lybert, a friend of Suffolk.

¹⁵ Father of Elizabeth Woodville.

¹⁶ Usher of the Chamber, deputy butler in Sandwich (id. v. 35, 407).

¹⁷ Somerset, Chancellor of the Exchequer, see p. 57 above.

¹⁸ Treasurer of the Chamber (id. v. 130).

¹⁹ The Queen's Chancellor, see p. 242 above.

²⁰ Cf. Battersea, sergeant of the Armoury, and usher of the Chamber (id. v. 299, vi. 247).

²¹ Probably Thomas Palmer, who appears on various commissions (id. v. 140, 298, 319, 444).

²² Sir Thomas Tresham, a devoted Lancastrian, who was beheaded after the battle of Tewkesbury in 1471; he had been brought up in the King's household (Dict. Nat. Biog. lvii. 203). His father, Sir William Tresham, was Speaker in 1450 and led the opposition to Suffolk (id. lvii. 205).

²³ John Vaumpage, or Vampage, the King's attorney in the Common Bench, 1448 to 1452 (Cal. Pat. Rolls, v. 131, 556).

²⁴ Thomas Greswold, or Gryswold, coroner of the King's Bench (id. iv. 114, v. 475).

²⁵ John Hampton, esquire for the King's body, master of the Queen's horses, and master of the ordnance (id. v. 214, 332).

²⁶ Presumably John Gargrave, whose name occurs before.

²⁷ Probably means Tandridge in Surrey.

ARTICLE 16.

This ben the names that were slayn. At Tonnebrigge vij^{xx}. At London &c xxvj. vij^{xx} &c penultimo die Junii in vigilia sancti Petri et Pauli. A^o xxviiij^o.

Will. Stafford. Vmfrey Stafford de Grafton. Crowmere. And his clerke. Mathew Gowgh in vigil Petri et Pauli, a^o supradicto. Shereff of London, a goldesmyth.¹ Dodenale. The Theffe pat went out of Seint Martyns. Say, behedid at Standard in Chepe. Bysshop of Salesbury, Askew.² M. Adam Molens.³ Willelmus de la Pole at Dovyrr. Thomas Est,⁴ yeman of the Crown. Wodhouse,⁵ yoman of the Crown. Sayes broper, areest. Secretory vnto Will. de la Poole. The Shiryff of Worscetter Shire⁶ at Tewkesbury: his Arm smytten of: And his Clerk his hond smyt of &c.

At that tyme was Wotton vnder Egge pulled down by Berkely &c.⁷

Also Sir John Hampdenne, knyght, and Steward to Suff., was slayn in the Castell of Flynt.

ARTICLE 17.

This is the Copy of the bill that my Lorde York put vnto the Kynge with other &c.

Please it your highnes tendirly to considere that⁸ gret grucchyng and Rumour⁹ is¹⁰ Vniuersally in this your¹¹ Realme of that Justice is not dewly maynteyned¹² to Suche as trespas and offende¹³ agaynst your lawes: And in Especiall of theym that be endited of treson, and other in beyng¹⁴ noysed of the same: wherby¹⁵ grete inconveniens hath ffollowed,¹⁶ and gret is likly for to do and fall¹⁷ herafter in this¹⁸ your said Realme, the¹⁹ which God defend, but yef²⁰ your highnes provision conuenable be made for dew reformation and punysshment in this ¹ John Sutton, who was Sheriff in 1440-1; neither of the Sheriffs of 1450 was killed.

² Or Ayscough; at Edingdon on 29th June.

³ Bishop of Chichester, at Portsmouth, on 9th Jan. 1450.

⁴ Cf. Cal. Pat. Rolls, v. 228, 232, 550; but he was alive in May, 1452.

⁵ John Wodehous (id. v. 209, 378, 413); apparently dead before 23rd Nov. 1450.

⁶ Thomas Huggesford was appointed Sheriff on 21st Oct. 1449, and John Brown on 19th Aug. 1450. Huggesford or Higford was alive in 1456 (Cal. Pat. Rolls, vi. 409).

⁷ In the course of a quarrel with the Earl of Shrewsbury. See Smith, Lives of the Berkelys, ii. 66-7, and Dugdale, Baronage.

⁸ the P. ⁹ murmur B.; murmure and grudging S.

¹⁰ romer that is P. ¹¹ our S. ¹² ministred B., P., S.

¹³ of offense MS. ¹⁴ obeyng MS.; beyng openly B., P., S.

¹⁵ wherfore, for, P. ¹⁶ that have fallen P.; haue fallen B., S.

¹⁷ lyke to fallen P.; like to fall B., S. ¹⁸ this om., B., P., S.

¹⁹ the om. B., P., S. ²⁰ if be P.; if by B., S.

behalue : Wherefore I, your Sugget¹ and trewe liege man, Richard, Duke of Yorke, willyng as effectually as I can,² desiring the³ suerte and prosperite of your most Riall persone, and welfare⁴ of this your noble Reame, Counseill and avertise your Excellens, for the conseruacion⁵ of the⁶ good tranquillite and peassable rewle among all your trewe⁷ Suggettes, for to ordeyn and provide that trewe⁸ Justice be hadde agaynst all Suche as ben endited and opynly noysed with in your Realme, I⁹ offur and woll put remedy¹⁰ for to execute your Commandement in these premisses for þe punysson¹¹ of Suche offenderres, and redresse the Said myssrewlers¹² to my myght and power &c.

And for hasty execucion heroff, like it your excellens¹³ to adresse your¹⁴ letturs of Prive Seele and writtes to your officers and ministers to do take and areest all Suche persons so noysed or endited, of what Estate, degre, or condicion so euer they be, and theym to commytte to your Towre of London, or to oþer your prisons, þer to abide w^t out¹⁵ Bayell or maynprice, vnto þe tyme þey be þerof vtterly tried and declared,¹⁶ after the course of your lawys.

ARTICLE 19.

This ben the namys that ben taken of the presoners of Fraunce last in Mensis Nouembris, A^o Regis H. sexti, xxx^o, at Whitby Havyn in the North Countre. The Erle of Northombrelond, Syr Henr. Peersy hath thaym in gouernance.

Sir Peers de Brasell, le Senescall de Fraunce et de Normandy. Le Bastard de Orliaunce, le counte de Denas.¹⁷ Jakes of Claremont, Baile de Cane. leȝ Charlis de Murrey, Capteyn of Depe. Sir William Manypeny, knyght, and Doctor of lawe. ij C. men of Armys, with all þe archeris. And ix shippes. All taken at the said Whitby hauen.

ARTICLE 20.

At Crayfford myle ffro Dertfford.

Primo die Mensis Marcii, Anno Regis Henrici sexti xxx^o ther was my Lord of Yorkes ordynaunce iij^mil Gowneres: And hymself in þe myddell ward w^t viij^mil: My Lord of Devynshere by þe Southe side

¹ humble suget B., P., S. ² can and B., P., S. ³ the om. P.

⁴ the welfare S. ⁵ conversacion P. ⁶ the om. B., P., S.

⁷ all trewe P.; all other S. ⁸ dewe B., P.

⁹ ben so endited or openly so noysed; wher inne I P.; such that so be indited or openly named, wherein I S. B. has openly indicted or openly noised.

¹⁰ put me in devour B., P.; offer my selfe and will put my endeavour S.

¹¹ for þe punysson om. P.

¹² redresse the same misrule B.; redresse of the said misrule, S.

¹³ Hyghnes B., P., S.

¹⁴ these S.

¹⁵ w^t with MS.

¹⁶ determined B., S.

¹⁷ Dunois.

w^t vjmill: And my Lord Cobham w^t vjmil at þe water side: And vij Shippes w^t þer stuff. And sith that tyme and sith was poyntement made and taken at Dertfford by embassetours, my Lorde þe B. of Wynchester,¹ my Lorde B. of Ely,² my Lord þe Erle of Salusbury, my Lorde of Warrewik, my Lord Bewcham,³ and my Lord of Sydely⁴ &c. Whiche poyntment was &c.

And soon after was Chatterley,⁵ yeman of the crown maymed, notwithstanding he was taken at Derby with money making and ladde to London. Then after the Kynges yeman of his Chambur, namyd Fazakerley,⁶ w^t letteris was sent to Luddelowe to my Lord of Yorke charging to do forth a certeyn of his mayny, Arthern, squier, Sharpe, squier &c. The whiche Fazakerley hyld in avowtry Sharpes wiff, the whiche Sharpe slewe Fazakerley, and a baker of Ludlow roos, and þe comyns &c., the whiche Baker is at Kyllingworth⁷ Castell &c. After þis my Lord of Shrewsbury⁸ &c rode in to Kent and set vp v peyre of Galowes and dede execucion vpon John Wilkyns,⁹ taken and brought to þe town as for Capteyn, and w^t other mony mo, of the whiche xxviij were honged and beheded, the whiche hedes were sent to London: and London said þer shuld no more hedes be set vpon ther. And þat tyme Eton was robbyd,¹⁰ and þe kyng beyng at Wyncore, on Lowe Sunday &c.

¹ William Waynflete. ² Thomas Bouchier. ³ John Beauchamp of Powyk.

⁴ Ralph Boteler, Lord Sudely. ⁵ Thomas Chatterley, Cal. Pat. Rolls, v. 34.

⁶ Richard Fazakerley, id. v. 526. ⁷ Kenilworth.

⁸ Commission dated 11th May, 1452 (Cal. Pat. Rolls, v. 577).

⁹ Pardon to associates of John Wilkyns, mostly of Wrotham, on 17th June, 1452 (id. v. 553).

¹⁰ Of goods and Jewels (id. v. 584-5).

XII. JOHN PIGGOT'S MEMORANDA

1450—1454

These Memoranda are contained on a single leaf (f. 144) of Harley MS. 543 in the writing of John Stow, who quoted two passages from them in his Survey of London.¹ In one of these he names the author as John Piggot, but without any indication as to who he was. The Memoranda seem to be the work of a contemporary; they consist entirely of current gossip and reports, which might naturally have been jotted down at the time, but could hardly have been included in a narrative of later date. Their disorderly and confused character might be due to Stow having made notes only of those things which he thought of interest; but it might equally be the result of the original writer having recorded what came to hand from time to time without any attempt at arrangement. However this may be, the whole of the Memoranda, though more curious than important, are novel. I have dealt with such points as call for comment in footnotes. Piggot would seem to have been a Londoner, and was perhaps connected with Stony Stratford, since several of his statements relate to incidents which happened there. In the latter part of the reign of Henry VI there was a John Pigot who was a London citizen and merchant of the staple at Calais; but he died early in 1454,² and there is nothing to connect him with the writer of the Memoranda.

Stow's Collections in Harley MSS. 543 and 545 contain a number of pieces relating to fifteenth-century history, which may be conveniently calendared here. HARLEY 543: ff. 131-9. Marriage of Charles of Burgundy and Margaret of York (Excerpta Historica, 227-39). f. 139^v. Extract from Bluemantle's Record (see p. 379 below). ff. 140-3. Visit of Philip of Burgundy in 1494. f. 144. Memoranda of John Piggot. ff. 145-6. Letters of Privy Seal to Thomas Cook (Ellis, Original Letters, 2nd Ser., i. 126) with instructions for their execution. f. 147. Apparently two drafts of Lancastrian proclamations in 1470-1, headed: 'By the Qwene' and 'By the Prynce'. f. 148. Edward IV to James of Scotland, demanding the surrender of traitors. f. 148^v. By the King. To mayor &c. of London, 17th June, 1475: on the intended war with France. f. 149. By the King: on Scottish affairs. f. 150. By the King from Durham in 1463: relating the capture of Bamburgh and Dunstanburgh. ff. 150-60. Extracts from a London Chronicle (for 1417-25) of the type of Cotton Julius B 1. f. 161-3. Articles of the Duke of York against bishop Moleyns of Chichester, with the reply thereto. f. 163. Answer by the Duke of Somerset to the credence sent by him to the kynge of Scots (Nicolas, Proceedings of Privy Council, vi, pp. lxiii, lxiv). f. 163^v. Replication agaynst y^e claymes of the Duke of York, by Sir John Fortescue (printed in full ap. Governance of England, pp. 353-4, and in part in Fortescue's Works, ii. 517-18). f. 164. Articles of y^e Erle of Warwyk coming fro Cales before y^e feld of Ludlow, 1459. Inc. 'For as moche as the comon weale, and the good politike laws'. f. 165. Articles of the Commons of Kent at the coming of the Erles of Marche &c. (Chronicles of the White Rose, pp. lxxiv-lxxvi; not an exact copy). f. 166. Articles and causes of thassembly of Robyn of Redesdale, shewn at York 1469 (Warkworth's Chronicle, pp. 47-51, from Ashmole MS. 1160). f. 168. Manner and guiding of the Earl of Warwick (Chronicles of the White Rose, pp. 229-34). ff. 169-70. Letter of Clarence and Warwick in 1470, with the King's reply (id., pp. 235-8; Ellis, Original Letters, 2nd Ser., i. 132). f. 171. Proclamation by the Earl of Warwick (White Rose, pp. 239-40, from another copy). ff. 172, 173. Articles from the Prince to the Earl of Warwick to be conveyed by him to King Henry. f. 174. A Letter from Louis XI in 1475.

¹ Survey, i. 91; ii. 121.

² Cal. Pat. Rolls, Henry VI, v. 315, 323; vi. 137, 210.

HARLEY 545: f. 132. Out of y^e Chronicle of Tewkesbury of mastar Somerset (see pp. 376-8 below). ff. 133^{vo}, 134^{ro}. A summary of history from 1431 to 1471. The conclusion alone is of interest:

'The whiche Kyng in the same yere, y^e xxij day of May, F dominicall, ix primacion,¹ and Wednysday the vigell and even of thassen- tion of our lord, from y^e towre of London was brought dead thurgh London openly, whiche vpon y^e Friday next astar was had and buried vnto thabbey of Chartsey in Surrey, where he lyethe buryed: vpon whose sowle god take it into his moste mercy. Amen per me J. V.'² ff. 134^{vo}-135. A remembrance of y^e first battayle at seint Albon's; giving York's letter to the King, the answer of the King, and York's words to his supporters (Stow, Annales, pp. 398-9). f. 136^{ro}. Replication made agaynst y^e title and clayme of y^e duke of York: another copy of Fortescue's tract; see Harley 543, f. 163. ff. 136^{vo}-138. Documents relating to Jack Cade's rebellion (id., pp. 388-9, 391-2).

1454 y^e 13 of August

Pigot

Ryse Richard, Rise Richard, Rise Richard, quia genuisti regem orbis. Vox in sompnis Anno domini 1454, mensis augusti die 13. William Alnwiki the good bysshope of lincolne lent and gave to h. the 6 a greate some of golde &c.

Anno 1448³ billes were set on the gates of powles writen to this effecte:

But Suthfolke, Salesberi,⁴ and Saye slaine were that England betrayed, on the first day of Maye we shulde be affrayde and say wele away.

But Suthfolke, Salesbery and Say

Be don to deathe by May

England may synge well away.

¹ The first quarter of the moon.

² This precise statement by a contemporary writer, of apparently Yorkist sympathy, is conclusive that Henry VI died on the night of 21-22 May, and not on 23rd May as alleged in the Arrival—see p. 175 above. It must have been written before 1484, when Henry's remains were translated to Windsor. I can make no suggestion as to who J. V. was.

³ A more likely date is 1450, to which year the following narrative belongs.

⁴ William Ayscough, bishop of Salisbury.

While Suthfolke was secrete and put in mew, the Kyng went to a parliament at Leicester and neglected S. Georges feast whiche shuld have bene selebrate. And as he passyd by Stony Stratforth in Buckyngham shire by way to Northampton, even in the strete sodaynly a thresher with his flaile cam by fortune: and one bad hym threshe afore the Kyng and of highe folly ded so in dede, where of the Kyng and many other toke hede; and for that outrage [he] was toke and committed to prison, for he sayde that he made that maistre to show that the Duke of Yorke then in Yreland shuld in lyke manner fight with traytours at Leicester parliament and so thrashe them downe as he had thrashed the clods of erthe in that towne. He was the next day led to the castle of Northampton, and Daniell labored his deathe w^t yomen of the crowne. His name was John Harris,¹ sometyme a shipman dwellynge in Yorke; he was drawne, hanged, boweled and quartered: his hed put on the southe gate of Northampton, his quarters at Yorke, Lyncolne, Bristowe, and Oxenforde. After that at Leicester came tydings to the Kyng of the deathe of Sowthfolke. And the capitayne of Kent sembled together a greate puissaunce vpon the blake hethe, his tent set vp where he sayde he would gyve judgment vpon traytors and extorcioners. One Stanlow was drawne and hanged at Maydestone on the even of S. John Baptist. The byssshope of Cantorbury, Staforth, and the bishop of York, Cardinall, the duke of Excestar, and the d. of Norfolke w^t Earles, barons, and a roiall rout of the K. came from Leicester to London. Then the capitayne removed to blake hethe. The powre on the Kynges partye with one voice sayde that excepte execucion was done on the named traytors they would resorte to the captayne and would returne the notts of their arrowes and shute bake agayne &c. Wiche trety was w^t y^e capitayne by b. p. doctor of diuinitie.² But he would not from that ground flie, but yf y^e K. came and then he would gyve place, and went bake w^t his hoste. Then the l. Say was had to the towre vnder govenaunce of the d. of excestar. Syr Humfrey Stafford knight slayne at sevenoke, and William Stafford esquiere, his cōsen, that would not yeld but fought w^t a two hand sworde on horsebake, and one w^t a pike forke bare hym out of his sadle, where he fought on foote tyll he was slayne and xxv mo on y^e 18 of July.³ Sonday⁴ next cam from Lecestar the archbisshope

¹ On 26th April at Leicester Richard Woodville, Thomas Daniell and others were commissioned to make inquisition in the county of Northampton touching all treasons &c. committed by John Harries of Terrington on the Hill in Yorkshire, shipman. Cal. Pat. Rolls, Henry VI, v. 383.

² All this is very disorderly.

³ It was on 18th June.

⁴ 11st June.

of Cantorbury w^t his company thurgh 3erdley¹ gobyn. When the K. at grenewiche hard the Staffords were slayne he retorned to Westminster, and sone after to Kyllingworthe. The 6 of June the 28 year of h. 6 and resorted to tounbridge and to dyvers places there aboute, as holyngworth and othars, and a fortnight after returned to blake hethe, and so to London, the second day of July cam into Southwarke.

The 23 of september Richard duke of Yorke came to stony stratforde, rydinge in redd velvet, on a blake horse and yrishe hoby: he lodgyd w^t out the gate at the red lion. There was slayne one Tresham² of northamton shire, an extorcioner, vnder multon parke. The duke rode to London and after that cam the d. of somarset from normandy. After whos comminge all the estates of this realme were at the blake friars w^t y^e Kynge at parliament; and there apered somarset and was charged w^t the lose of normandy: his place was spoyled and moche of his goods perloned: he was had to the towre, but anon he was delyvered by the Kynge and set in rule as afore. After Christmas the K. made his iorney into Kent, w^t whome rode the duke of Excestar, Somarset, Shrewesbery, Lille, and Crumwell, Roos, w^t knights, esquires, and gentlemen: which erle of Shrewesbery cam from the courte of Rome, ffov^rte sonday of advent, that had bene ferce in fight, moaste dred of all other in france in werr, 60 yeres in yrland, france and gienne. The duke of Yorke kept at stratforth the bowe. So vp Cantorbery, Rochestar, Favarsham &c. xxx persons were put to death, theyr heds were sent to london bridge.

The l. Rivars shuld have past the see, but taried at Plimouth the tyll all his money was spent, and then sent to the d. of Somarset for theyr wages: he sent them the ymage of S. George of sylver and golde to be solde, w^t the almes dishe of the d. of Glocestar: for coyne had they none.³

The same day the Kynge cam out of London a misfortune fell at our lady called de Pew on the wedensday.⁴ There was a clarke Keper of that ymage dubbed w^t iewells of precious stone perle and rings many, no iewellar cowlde iudge the price: this clarke taught children thereby, and comanded a childe to put out the candels, and beinge negligent there was brent ornaments, golde and golde rings, precious ¹ Yardley.

² William Tresham; he was a Yorkist and was killed at Moulton on 23rd Sept., whilst on his way to join York. See Rolls of Parliament, v. 212; Chron. Giles, p. 42.

³ Stow, Survey of London, i. 91. The expedition was projected at the end of 1450, but after nine months' delay at Plymouth was abandoned. See Cal. Pat. Rolls, v. 437-9, 444, 447-9, 462, 472, 476; and Ramsay, Lancaster and York, ii. 146.

⁴ Probably 30th December, 1451.

stones, apparayle, that were about that ymage &c.¹ So to Northampton the Kynge toke his way and there toke his counsell and sent for his lords: and they had liveries whit and blewe, writen lyke rope on bawdrikeyse: from thens he went to Donstable, where thrughe counsell he sent letters to y^e D. of Yorke. At this counsell was d. of Excetar, y^e d. of buckyngham, good d. of Norfolke, therles of Salisbury, Shrewsbury, Worcestar, and Wilshire, Vicount Beaumont and Lile, lord Gray Ruthyn, l. Clifforth, l. Egremounte, l. Molenes, Sturton, Camus, l. Beauchampe. The d. of Yorke cam from poales² past ovar Thamis onto Kent to Dartford his owne ground, his bulwarks and bastels were made stronge. The b. of Ely and of Winchester, w^t y^e Erles of Sallisbery and Warwike, his sonne, rod between Kynge and Duke tyll a peace was made betwene them: the d. was sworne.³

1453 the xx of July died the earle of Shrofbury and his sonn Vicount lile.

¹ Stow, Survey of London, ii, 121.

² There is something wrong; York crossed the Thames at Kingston.

³ See the fuller narratives on pp. 298, 367-8 above.

XIII. YORKIST NOTES

1471

These brief notes come from f. 25^{vo} of Arundel MS. 28 at the British Museum. They were all apparently written at the same time, and therefore after the execution of the Bastard of Fauconberg on 22 Sept., 1471. Probably, however, the date was not much later; and thus these Notes, though destitute of any literary character, are of value as a contemporary record. The statement that Richard of Gloucester went into Kent on the morrow of the death of Henry VI, and that Edward IV followed on 23rd May, is significant. The writer at all events believed that Henry VI died on 21st May, though he gives no hint of the manner of his death. The writer is Yorkist, and his statement is probably more nearly contemporary than that of any other authority except The Arrival.¹ Since the Notes were obviously written without any ulterior motive, their evidence in support of the accepted date—the night of 21–22 May—is strong. The lists of those slain at Barnet and Tewkesbury, and of the Yorkist lords, are interesting.

The main content of Arundel 28 is a Latin Chronicle for 1301–68. The volume formerly belonged to Lord William Howard.

Anno domini Mccccx primo, Bellum iuxta Barnet in die pasche (mensis Aprilis die xxiiij): vbi occisi fuerunt Ricardus, Comes Warwic, et Johannes, Marchio de Montagu, eius frater, pro parte Henrici sexti; et Rex Edwardus iiij^{us} obtinuit victoriam, atque ex suis fuerunt ibidem interfecti dominus de Crommewel et dominus de Say, item Humfridus Bourcher, primogenitus et heres domini de Bareners, cum multis aliis. Ex alia parte fugerunt Henricus, Dux Exon., et Johannes, Comes Oxon., cum pluribus aliis.

Eodem anno mensis Maii die iiij^{to} Bellum iuxta Tewkysbury, vbi occisi fuerunt Edwardus, dictus princeps, filius Henrici sexti, Johannes Courtenay, Comes Deuon., Johannes, dominus de Wenlocke, Johannes Beaufort, frater ducis Somersetie, Johannes Langstrother, prior Sancti Johannis, cum pluribus aliis nobilibus, militibus et armigeris. Item quod pauci de parte Henrici euaserunt. Et cessit victoria dicto Regi Edwardo quarto, nemine ex suis nobilibus pereunte.

Et capta est Margareta, olim dicta regina, vxor prefati Henrici.

Eisdem anno et mense Kentenses increduli prioris victorie insurrexerunt nomine dicti Henrici, ipsorum capitaneo et duce Thoma facomberge bastardo. Qui volentes intrare ciuitatem London. per vim, nouam portam super pontem magnum ciuitatis, cum nonnullis domibus et tenementis inter ipsam portam et pontem leuabilem,¹ ibidem hostiliter cremauerunt. Temptarunt insuper vna cum presidio eorum de Essexia apud portam de Algate invenire introitum, qui tamen viriliter per Londonienses post aduentum Antonii, comitis de Ryuers, qui in eos ad dorsum subito irruit, adueniens ex turri London., viriliter fuerunt dispersi, multis ex eis horribiliter interfectis, ceteris captis et fugatis; quod factum fuit xiiij^o die mensis Maii supradicto.

¹ Where the wrong date seems to be given wilfully. See pp. 175 and 370 above.

Eodem mensis Maii die xxj^o rediit Rex Edwardus ad ciuitatem London. cum nobili triumpho, faciens secum adduci dictam Margaretam, olim reginam, in curru precedente exercitui. Et equitauit per medium ciuitatis, vexillis et standardis displicatis, tanquam in itinere et expeditione capta aduersus prefatos Kentenses. In cuius comitiva tunc fuerunt duces de Clarence et Gloucester, ipsius fratres; item duces de Northfolke et Southfolk, et de Bukyngham; item comites de Northumberland, de Shrovesbury, de Ryuers, de Essex, de Wyltshyre, de Pembroke; Barones, domini de Audeley, de Stanley, de Grey Ruthyn, filius et heres de Comitibus Cancie, de Grey Cotenor, de Barreners, de Cromwell, de Dacres, de Hastynges, de Howard, de Dynham, de Cobham, de Mautravers, filius et heres de Arundell, de Bourgcher, de Dudley, de Scrope, de Ferrers, cum aliis nobilibus, militibus et armigeris, ac multitudine equitum maiore quam ante sit visa.

Eodem anno decessit Henricus sextus, olim dictus rex Anglie, apud turrinam London., et sepultus est in monasterio de Chertesei iuxta Tamisiam, Winton. diocesis. Et sic nemo relinquitur in humanis qui ex illo stipite coronam petat.

In crastino Dux Gloucester cum primo exercitu Regis intravit Canciam; quem sequitur dominus Rex in die Ascensionis cum residuo exercitu, viz. xxiiij^o die dicti mensis Maii. Eodem anno mense Septembri, dictus Thomas faucomberge propter nouam offensam decapitatus est, et caput suum super pontem magnum leuabilem dicte ciuitatis positum est.

¹ The Drawbridge.

XIV. FROM A CHRONICLE OF TEWKESBURY ABBEY

1471

This little piece furnished Stow with the original of a passage in his Annales, p. 424; though he seems to have added some things from another source. Stow puts 'Lib. Tews.' in the margin. In another place (Annales, p. 385) he gives 'Lib. Theauxbury' as his authority for a statement as to Henry Beauchamp, Duke of Warwick; see also his Summary for 1575, pp. 365, 367, 368; probably he took these references from the same volume, which apparently belonged to his friend Robert Glover, Somerset Herald; it now seems to be lost. The narrative is of interest for the names 'Gastum' and 'Campus Grandis' given to the site of the battle, in the hilly fields now called the Gastons, which include some old earthworks (probably Roman) sometimes called 'Margaret's Camp', though Sir J. H. Ramsay was 'assured on the spot that the proper name was Camp Ground'.¹ The list of the slain is noteworthy for its fullness and its description of the places of burial. The reference to Prince Edward supports Warkworth's statement that he was killed in the field, and is against the story that he was murdered after the battle; the concluding words are suggestive of Lancastrian sympathy. The writer shows himself ill at home in his Latin. Stow's transcript is in Harley MS. 545, f. 132—see p. 370 above.

Out of y^e Chronicle of Tewkesbery of mastar Somarset.

Memorandum quod anno domini 1471, littera dominicalis F. bellum fuit apud Barnad inter villam sancti Albani et ciuitatem London. die pasche in mane, vbi ex una parte fuit rex Edwardus iiij cum fratribus eius, multis aliis dominis, in quo occisus est dominus de Bowser et alii quamplures, et ex altera parte cum Ricardo Neucl comiti Warwiche et fratre eius Johanne Nevil, qui ambo ibi interfecti sunt cum multis aliis dominis et ūlendis² personis, Rege Edwardo victoriam optinente.

Item eodem anno iiij non. may sequente, videlicet in festo inuencionis sancte crucis, uenit Tewkesburie Edwardus Henrici sexti regis filius et princeps cum grande exercitu, et in crastino intrauit grandem campum ubi uocatur Gastum. Vbi Rex Edwardus iiij cum suo exercitu adueniens predictum principem Edwardum occidit in campo predicto, vbi etiam Johannes Somerset frater ducis de Somerset, Comes de devonshire et dominus de Wenloke cum multis aliis interfecti fuerunt. Exercitus vbi predicti regis Edwardi iiij furiosi in monasterium et in villam de Tewks. intrantes spoliauerunt quamplurimos et abstulerunt bona monasterii, et quidam ecclesiam intrantes violente manu et miseros de exercitu predicti principis necarunt et occiderunt quam in cimiterio quam eciam in ecclesia, ex quo facto polluta est ecclesia : sic stante quia nec misse nec aliud diuinum officium ibi fire [? fere] per vnum mensem agerentur. Et reconciliata est ecclesia item cum cimiterio per dompnum suffragane episcopi Wigornia iij Kalleds Jun. vij fere v. ante pentecost ex sumptu monasterii. Isti vero capite truncati sunt ad altam crucem ville Tewks. Postquam vero victoriam optinuit predictus rex Edwardus in campo illo uocatur Gastum, et monasterium ac uillam cum suis intrant, mansit iiij dies fer.¹ : vbi multa dampna perpetrata sunt. Vbi eciam capti sunt dux de Somerset, dominus et prior sancti Iohannis apud London., Thomas Trissam, miles, Iohannes delues filius Iohannis delvis senioris, qui in campo occisus fuit, James Audeley frater domini de Audeley.

¹ Lancaster and York, ii. 379.

² Probably 'ualentis' in error for ualentibus.

These are the names of the noblemen that were slayne at Tewkesbury felde.

Lord Edwarde, prince of Kynge Henry, in the felde of Gastum besyde Tewkesbery, slayne and buried in y^e mydste of y^e covent quiere in y^e monastery ther : for whom god worketh. Lord Edmunde Duke late of Somarset taken and behedyd and buried before an ymage of S. James at an autar in y^e sayd monastery church on y^e northe parte. Lord John Somarset, brother of y^e sayd duke of Somarset, slayne in the fylde ther, and buried w^t his sayd brother before y^e sayd ymage toward mary mawdlyns auter. Lord Thomas² Courtney Erle of Devonshire slayne in the filde and buried about y^e mydst of y^e sayd auter of saynt James. Syr Vmfray Haudeley ther take and behedyd and buried w^t y^e sayd Thomas Courtney, Erle of Devenshire, in one sepulcre before y^e sayd altar. Lord Wenloke slayne in the filde & his body take fro hens to be buried. Sir Edmund Barnarde knight slayne in y^e filde and syr William Whytingham knyght, slayn also in y^e filde and bothe bodyes buried in y^e body of y^e sayd monastarye church callyd y^e parishe church besyde saint Jorges chapell. Syr John Delves, elder, slayne in y^e filde : mastar John Delves, his sonne, take and beheadyd ; and both buried by syds seynt Johns chapell in y^e sayde parishe church and theyr bodies afterward take fro hens to theyr contrey. Syr John Locnor³ slayne and buried in y^e sayd parishe church besyds y^e bodies of ser Edmond and ser William before sayde. Syr William Vauce, knyght, slayn in y^e fild, and buryed in y^e parishe church before an image of our lady pety in y^e northe syd. Syr Geruase of Clifton, knyght, take and behedyd. Syr William Car, knyght, ser Henry Rose, knyght, taken and behedyd and buryed in y^e church yarde there. Syr William Lymouthe, knyght, Ser John Vring, knyght, ser Thomas Semer, knyght, ser William Rowes, knyght, all slayne in y^e filde and buryed in y^e church yarde. Syr Thomas Tryssam, knyght, take and behedyd, whos body was buryed in y^e sayd monastary church byfore a pilar betwyxt y^e awtar of s. james and seint nicholas. Syr Willyam Newborow, knyght, take and behedyd, buryed in y^e parishe church, besyds y^e fante of baptisme y^{er} in y^e southe syde. Mastar Henry Wrattesley, squier, slayne in y^e filde and buryed in s. john baptist chape in y^e monastary church on y^e southe syde. Mastar Henry Baron, squire, slayn and buryed in y^e parishe church before an Image of seint clement pope and martyr, and his body afterwarde was fet from hens to his contrey. Mastar Fildyngge, squire, Mastar Hervy, recorder of Bristow, bothe slayne in y^e filde and theyr bodyes buryed in y^e church w^t many othar. John Gower, swerde berer of y^e prince, John Flore,¹ bannarberer of y^e duke of Somarset, Henry Tressam, Watar Courtney, Robait Acson,² Lewis Milis, Birchfeld of Westminster, Mastar Gogh, squire, ser Thomas Tressam his clerke, Turnebull, all take and behedyd, and theyr bodyes buryed in y^e church in dyvars placis. Also prior and lord of saynt Jones besyds London, taken in y^e fild and w^t othar behedyd, whos body cloyd in leade was take from hens to his owne place.

¹ Perhaps for ferias.

² Should be John.

³ Lewknor.

Thes wer ther taken and presentyd to y^e kyng, and pardonyd: ladye Margaret, qwene, ladye Anne, princes, ser John Foskew, chefe Judge of yngland, doctor Makerell, John Throomorton, Mastar Beynton, Mastar Wroghton; all pardonyd. Ser Henry Courtney take and afterward behedyd.³

¹ Flory Stow.

² Jackson Stow.

³ With the above may be compared the shorter lists in Paston Letters, No. 777, and Warkworth, pp. 18, 19.

XV. THE RECORD OF BLUEMANTLE PURSUIVANT

1471—1472

This narrative is preserved in two sixteenth-century copies in Cotton MS. Julius C. vi, ff. 255-9, and Additional MS. 6113, ff. 101-7; the latter lacks the accounts of the Feast of St. George and the mission to Charles the Bold (pp. 380-2 below), from which we learn that the original writer was Bluemantle Pursuivant. It is not known who held that position in 1472 (see Anstis ap. Add. MS. 9013, p. 946). The two narratives of the Coming of the Lord Gruthuyse, and of his Creation as Earl of Winchester (pp. 382-8 below) were printed by Sir F. Madden in Archaeologia, xxvi. 265-86, from Add. MS. 6113. In both manuscripts they appear in the order here given; they are clearly two separate accounts, but the second should strictly come first as containing the earliest matter in point of time. Though a considerable part of the Record has thus been printed before, it seems worth giving in full as the personal narrative of a contemporary.

The two manuscripts show some small textual variations. I have followed the Cotton MS. (J.), but have taken a few corrections from the Additional MS. (A.) together with such variant readings as seem of sufficient interest. Stow copied a brief extract (p. 380 below) in Harley MS. 543, f. 139^{vo}—see p. 369 above.

A^o domini M. iiij C. lxxj.

On Christmas day the King our soueraigne lorde, Edward the iiij^{te} after the conquete, was crowned at Westmester, and y^e quene also. Hee kepte his estate in the Whyt hall the same day. The Bishop of Rochester, w^{ch} song hyh masse the same day of coronacion, sat at the Kings borde on the right hand, and the Duke of Bokingham on the left hand.

On Neweres day.

The King and the quene went in procession, and were not crowned; the King kept non astate in the hall.

On twelf day.

The King and quene went a procession: the king crowned, and the quene not¹ crowned because she was grete with childe. He kept his estate in the whyt hall, the bishop of Rochester on his right hand, and the erles of Shrewesbury and of Essex on the left hand.

A^o supradicto.²

The ij^{de} day of the month of Apryll came to Bruge worshipfull ambassat of our soveraigne lord the Kinge, the w^{ch} were honorably rec^d w^t out the toune of Bruge of the lord of Gruthuse.

¹ The Kinge was crowned and went a procession; the quene went a procession and was not A.

² Clearly 1472 is meant.

The names of the Kinges ambasadours : Sir John Scot, knight, the marshall of Calles, M^r William Hatclyff, secretary to the Kinge, M^r John Russell, doctor and archdeacon of Barkes, M^r Richard Marten, archdeacon of London, S^r John Yong, knight and merchant of London.¹ And on the iiij^{te} day of the said month the said Embassiat was honorably accompanied wth the foresaid lorde, all on horssebake sauynge there seruantes, from ther logyng to the dukes court. And on the same day came out of Fraunce a gret embassat to the foresaid duke of Burgoine,² and were rd. into Bruge at afternone.

On sonday the v^{te} day of the foresaid month.

The foresaid embasadours of England dyned in the Dewkes court wth the lorde Bastarde in his chamber; and on the vj^{te} day of the same month they dyned wth m. lady the duches of Burgoine³ at the male, but not at her owne table but in a chamber wth her chamberleyn; and on the vij^{te} day wth the lord Grutehusse.

The feast of S^t Jorge kept.

In the foresaid yere the King, o^r soueraigne lorde, kept his feast of S^t Jorge at his castell of Wyndsor, and kept his estate in the foresaid castell; the Bushope of Wynchester sat on the right hand, and the right noble Duke of Glocester and therle of Essex on the left hand. There were present therle of Douglas, the lord Barnes, the lord Dures.

On the morne after the feast come to the chapter of the order of the garter into the chapter howse come the Kinge, the Duke of Glocester, therle of Essex, the lord Berners, the lieutenaunte of thorder, therle of Doglas, the lord Duras, and sir John Asteley; the w^{ch} sir John Asteley was sent for to London by Cales pursuyvant to come to furnishe y^e chapter. In the w^{ch} chapter were chosen to be bretherne of the said order :

My lord the Prynce
The K. of P.⁴
The Duke of Norff.
The Erle of Wylshere
The l. fferrers
The l. montioye &
The lord heyward.

vij elected at y^e
chapter.

¹ A. adds: M^r Crosby, knight and marchante of London. See Stow, Annales, 426.

² Bokyngham J. ³ Bokyngham J.

⁴ Probably the King of Portugal. See Anstis, Register of the Order of the Garter, i. 50, 51, ii. 187, and Belz, Memorials of the Order of the Garter, p. lxi.

And that day they had a masse of Requyem, and at the tyme of offertory the King offered, and the knightes of the garter ther beinge present, when the [King] had offered, [offered] there one offeringe; the Duke of Glocester and the lord Barnes offered y^e sword, bering the pomell forward of the goode of the right feyfull and noble lorde therl of Wychestre¹; therle of Essex and therl Duglas his helme: the lord Duras and sir John Asteley the sword of therl of Pembroke; the Duke of Glocester and the lord Barnes his helme: therl of Essex and therl of Duglas the sword of therl of Ryvers; the lord Duras and sir John Asteley his helme. Also the Duke of Glocester and the lord Barnes offered the sword of sir Robert Harcorte; therl of Essex and therl of Duglas his helme.

A^o domini M. iiij cc. lxxij.

The King o^r soueraigne lord sent a right worshipfull man in his embassat to y^e right mighty prynce his brother the Duc of Bourgoyne, called Mr Willm. Hatcleff, and to wayte vpon hym an harroulde called Lancaster, and a pursuyvant called Blewmantell; also there wayted vpon hym a shipe called the roos, well furneshet wth men of warre; and toke his shippe at Wynchelsey on a fryday²; and on the saterday londyd in Pyguardi fast by a vyllage called Damme a lytel fro Estaples; and on the sonday wee rode to Coote, and on the monday by water to Abeville, and there he abode tyll he had certene tydinge where the Duke was: and on o^r Lady day the natyvete,³ the was viij days oughter his cominge to tounne, he had word y^t the Duc forward was to yen in Normandy. Wherefore Incontynent as sone as he coude [he sent] me, Blewmantell pursevant, to y^e Duke, and for to let hym have knoledge of his commynge. I rode as far as a vyllage called qwanten a lege fro pero,⁴ where I met wth the capytayne of the forward called my lord Phelippe of Creuecure,⁵ the w^{ch} for the Kinges sake made me right grete chere and caunsled me to abyde in his company tyll I shoulde goo thense to the Duc. And on the morne he reine to Blange, where he bode tyll the Duke come.⁶ Also he had under hym CCCC. speres, w^{ch} were loged in vylages all about hym, ridyng all wey in batell thus: euery C. speres had a standart and ij penons, j penon for the custerelles,⁷ and y^e bowes on horsebake, w^{ch} went before, anoder for the fotemen, and the standart for y^e speres; vnder or fast by the standart rode the capytene of y^e C. speres; and

¹ The Sire de Gruthuyse. See p. 383 below.

² 28th August.

³ 8th Sept.

⁴ † Peronne.

⁵ Crevecoeur.

⁶ Charles the Bold came to Blangy on 11th Sept., où il receut les Ambassadeurs d'Angleterre et de Bretagne, Commines-Lenglet, ii. 202.

⁷ The coustilliers: light horsemen, so styled from their long knives or daggers.

lyke order kepte euery C. speres. These were the capitaynes: Syr Phelippe Creuecure, capitayne of all y^e forward; Syr Oliuer de la Marche, capytayne de C. l.; Syr Baudwyn de Lanoy, capyt^t de C. lance; Mounser Mount taverne, capt. de C. lance; the baylie of Saint Quintyn, capt. de C. lance; Mounsyr de Boi esser, capt. de C. lance. And on the fryday¹ about ix of the cloke I had word y^e Duc was but iij leges thens comyng thedder ward. I rode agenst hym and saw his holle host in Remeving; to my Jugement ther was mor then a M. cartes charged w^t gonnes, tentes, vyttalles, mylles, pauys, gunstones and innumerable necessaries, the Duc hym[self] being in his rereward, wher I present hym my letter.

In the foresaid yere of o^r Lord, and in the month of Octobre on the feast of St^t Edward, our most dred and lyge lord the Kinge Edward the iijth, w^{ch} was the xij yere of his most noble Raigne, kepte his Royall estate in his pallyse of Westmester. And about x of the cloke afore none the King come into the parlement chamber in his parlement robes, and on his hed a cap of mayntenaunce, and sat in his most Royall maieste, having before hym his lordes spirituall and temporall, also the speker of the parlement, w^{ch} is² called Willm. Alynton, the wiche declared byfore the Kinges good grace³ and his noble and sadd consell thentent and desyre of his comyns specially in the comendacion of the womandly behavvour and the grete constans of o^r Soueraigne Lady the quene the [King being]⁴ beyonde the say. Also the grete joy and suerty to this his lond the birth of me lord the prynce.⁵ It^m the knightly demeninge of my lordes his bredren, my l. the Duke of Clarence and my lord the Duke of Glocester. It^m the constant fayth of my lordes Rivers and Hastings, chaumberleyn to o^r most dred and lyege lorde the Kinge, w^t oder nobles and yomen being w^t the Kinge beyonde the say. It^m all the nobles w^t there parte takers to take St^uery,⁶ some put into dyuers⁷ prisen, some to make fyne to their Importunate charge. It^m the grete humanitye and kyndnes of my lord Gruthuse shewed to his highnes when he⁸ was in the counties of Holand and Flaunders, the foresaid lord Gruthuse ther being present. Wherefore y^t shoulde plese his moste noble grace to have all thes byfore rehersed specially commended. Then the Kinge gave in commaundement to y^e Bushop of Rochester, then being keper of y^e grete seale, for me L. y^e chaun-cellor was sicke, to geve them in his behalff his most gracious and laudable thankynge. This done the Kinge torned ageyne to his chamber accompened w^t his lordes. The lord Gruthuse¹ went into a chamber by o^r lady of pu² and put vpon hym y^e habilement of an Erle; the Kinge³ came eft sones in his most Royall matie, crowned like as he went in prosession, into y^e parlement chamber, the Duc of Clarence bare his trene, wher the King sent for to present the foresaid lorde Gruthuse to his high matie the right nobles therles of Arundell and of Essex, w^{ch} went on ether syde of hym. Also therle of Wylshyre bare a sworde before hym, the pomel vpward; also⁴ w^t dyuers oder lordes; also w^t the Kinges officers of armes, Garter bering his patent: tyll he come before the Kynges presence, where afterward the King gyrd the said sword abowt hym, and creat hym Erle of Wynchester, Mr Willm. Acleff,⁵ the Kynges Secretory, reding openly his patent. This done the King went into the Whit hall, wheder come the quene crowned. Also my [lord the] prince⁶ in his robes of estate, w^{ch} was borne next after y^e King by his chamberleyn called Mr Vaghane, and so proceded forth into y^e abbey cherche and so vp to y^e shryne of St Edward, where y^e offered. Then the King torned downe into y^e quere, where he sat in his trone unto the prosession tyme; therle of Wynchester bare his sword all y^e procession, and so fourth into the tyme that he⁷ went to dynner. The King kept his estate in y^e whyt hall, and the Bushop of Lyncoln sang the high mas; wherefore he sat on the right honde of the kinge, and on the left hond sat the Duc of Clarence, and therl of Wynchester; at y^e beginning of the table on y^e right syde of the halle sat y^e Bushope of Ely, the B. of Duresme, the B. of Chester, and the Bushop of Excester. And at the table on the other syde sat the Duc of Bokyngham and the Duke of Suffolke, and therl of Arundell, therl of Northumberland, therl of Shrowesbery; and therl of Wylshyre wayted on the Kinges coberd as chef boteler for y^t day. Also at the same table sat the prior of St Jones, the lord Gre Codener,⁸ the lord Audeley, the lord Dacres, the lord Sturton, and the lord Grey of Wylton, the lord Monioy⁹ and the lord Denant.¹⁰ In all oder service and seremonyes the king was served lyke as is his olde accustome in soche a feaste. My lord Chamberleyn wayted vpon the croune y^t day. The Kinge of his grace gave vnto his office of armes his larges. Wherefore at the tyme

¹ 11th Sept.² commyn parlamente was A.³ before the Kinge A.⁴ he beinge A.⁵ to his lande the byrthe of the Prince A.⁶ Sanctuary.⁷ dures of A.⁸ when the Kinge A.

¹ Creacion at the tyme aforesayd of the lorde Grautehuse. The sayde lorde A.

² The Chapel of the Pew, or king's closet. See Stow, Survey of London, ii. 121, 379.

³ Kinge om. J. ⁴ accompenyed also A. ⁵ Attecliffe, or Hatticlyf.

⁶ Also the Prence A. ⁷ they A.

⁸ Grey of Codnor.

⁹ Montjoy.

¹⁰ Sir John Dinham, Lord Dinham accustomed Mr Garter¹ gave hym thankes in the name of all the office. Mr Norry² cryed y^e larges in iij places of the hall, because Mr Garter had an Impediment in his tonge. We come eft sones before the Kinges grace, wer Mr Garter Informed hym and prayde hym to geve thankes of y^e grete larges y^t y^e said Erle of Wynchester had yeven to his officers of armes. Norry King of Armes made the crye in to place of the hall as ensheweth: Larges! Larges! Larges! De par le treshault et trespuisant seigr le Counte de Wynchestre, Seigr de Gruthuse, prince De Steenhuse, Seigr de Auelghien, de Spiers, de Hamsted et de Arscampe,³ Largesse &c.

Not^m. When the King had weshet and graces were seid the King creat a King of Armes, baptysed hym⁴ and set a croune on his hed, w^{ch} was called Rychemond. That done y^e King had his voyde⁵ betwyxt v and vj of the cloke; the voyde done the King went to his chamber accompanied w^t his lordes, wher therl of Wynchester toke his conge, and was well accompanied to his logging w^t therl of Essex, my lord chamberleyn and dyuers other nobles; and these heroudes before hym, Mr Garter principall King of Armes, Clarenceus⁶ King of Armes, Norry King of Armes, Marche⁷ King of Armes, Wyndesore herralde, Smowden⁸ herroude to y^e King of Scotcs, Blewmantell pursevyant, Esperaunce pursevyant to therl of Northumberland.⁹

In the foresaid yere of o^r lord M. cccclxxij.

In the moneth of September the right high and mightie prince, Charles Duc of Bourgoyne &c, sent in embassat the right noble lord, the lord Gruthuse, to y^e high and mighty prince & o^r most dred lege lord, the King, Edward the iiijth by y^e grace of God of England & of Fraunce & lorde of Ireland, w^{ch} was honoratly received by ij esquyers of y^e Kinge, the tone called Robert Ratclyff, porter of Calles, and the other Thomas Twates, baylie of Guynes, viij myle Englyshe from Cales, at a Toune called Greuenyng: and so come to Calles, were he was also received by y^e lorde Haywarde, Syr John Scotte, marshall of Calles, Syr William Peche, Syr Jeffray Gatte, w^t dyuers oder nobles, w^t whome as long as he beinge in the toune of Calles daylie and nightly was fested, and as I vnderstande, he was there iij or iiij dayes. Also they of y^e kinges counsell of y^e toune of Calles ordeined for hym iij or iiij shepes well furnessed w^t men of warre to save-

¹ John Smert.

² Thomas Holme.

³ Oorsampe A.

⁴ baptysed hym Gyen A.

⁵ The voyde was a parting-cup, served at the end of the feast.

⁶ William Hawkeslowe.

⁷ Perhaps John Marche.

⁸ Snowden A.

⁹ A. has finis at the foot of f. 103^{ro}, and on f. 103^{ro} begins the narrative on pp. 379-80 above.

conduicte hym into England. In the whiche were with hym syr Jeffray Gate and Mr Ratclyff, Porter of Calles. And they aryved at Dover, where y^e forsayde Lorde Gruthuse was honorably receved by y^e mayre of the toun and his bretherne, also by ij esquiers, y^t were sent thether by the Kinge from his owne courte, the tone called Mr Morrys Arnolde, sergent porter, and y^e other Mr John Herlis, w^{ch} allway accompanied hym, and at y^e Kinges commaundement and cost, tyll he come to London. And when he was save on londe, the forsaide nobles Syr Jeffray Gatte and Mr Ratclyff w^t their company torned agayne to Cales. When the sayde lorde Gruthuse come to Caunterbury he was presented w^t wyne, capons, vezandes, partridges and other presentes, soche as they had in the Religious places, bothe of Crist cherche and Sainte Augustynes. The meyre and his brethren presented hym also w^t soche dyntes¹ as they had. Also when he com to Rochester he was presented by y^e meyre and his brethern to soper w^t wyne, capons, vasants, partridge, and after soper w^t frute and swete wyne.

Item in the morninge, or he departed to Gravesende, he was represented w^t swete wyne.

Item when he came to London the ij shreves of London wayted vpon hym at Lyon Key, from whence they sente a bott, in the whiche were iiij sergantes, for to mete hym. And they caused hym to lande at the forsaide Key, wher he was honorably received by the foresayde Shreves. And so fourthe conduicte to on of there places to Dynner, whiche ys called Shelley,² where he had an honorable and a plenteous dynner; and after dynner he was accompanied by the saide Shreves to the Crane in the Vyntry, where they toke there leve. And so the forsayde lorde Grutehuse went by water from thence to Westm., to y^e Dene of St^t Stevens chappell place in Chanon Roo, w^{ch} was ordeined for hym by the Kinge and his Councell. And w^t in ij dayes after by the advyse of Mr Thomas Vaghan he rode to Wyndsore, to y^e Kinge, accompanied also w^t the forsayde ij esquiers, Mr Morrys Arnolde, and Mr John Heryllys, w^t oder. And when he come into the castell, into y^e quadrante, my lord Hastings, chamberleyn to o^r souereigne lorde the Kinge, Syr John A Parre, Syr John Don, w^t dyuers oder lordes and nobles, receiued hym to the Kinge.

¹ deyntes A.

² The sheriffs in Sept. 1472 were John Allin and John Shelley, not John Brown and Thomas Bledlow (as stated in Archaeologia), who only took office at Michaelmas.

³ Probably John Shelley's house; or it may be Shelley House near St Mary Staining.

Md. that the Kynge dyd to be impareled on the far syde of the quadrant ij chambres richeley hanged w^t clothes of Arras, and w^t Beddes of astate ; and when he had spoken w^t the Kinges good grace and the quene, he was accompanied to his chamber by me lorde Chamberleyn [and] Syr John A Parre, w^t dyuers moo, w^{ch} soopt w^t hym in his chamber : also there sopt his servauntes. When they had sopte, my lord chamberleyn had hym againe to y^e Kinges chamber, and incontinent the Kinge had hym to y^e quenes chamber, wher she sat plainge w^t her ladyes at the morteaulex,¹ and some of her ladyes and gentlewomen at the Closheys² of yvery, and Daunsing. And some at dyuers other games accordinge. The whiche sight was full plesant to them.³ Also y^e Kinge daunsed w^t my lady Elizabeth, his eldest doughter. That done, the night passed ouer, they wente to his chamber. The lord Gruthuse toke leue, and my lorde Chamberleyn w^t dyuers other nobles accompanied hym to his chamber, where they departed for that night. And in the morninge, when Matens was done, the Kinge herde in his owne chappell or lady masse, w^{ch} was melodyously songe, the lorde Grutehuse beinge there presente. When the mas was done, the Kinge gave the sayde lorde Grutehuse a cup of golde, garnished w^t perrye, and in mydest of the cup is a grete pece of an Vnicornes horne⁴ to my estimacyon vij ynches compase. And on the cover was a grete safyre. Then he wente to his chamber where he had his brekefast. And when he had broken his faste, the Kynge come into y^e quadrant. My lorde Prince also, borne by his Chamberleyn called Mr Vaghan, w^{ch} bad y^e foresaide lord Gruthuse welcome. Then the Kinge had hym and all his company into y^e lytell Parke, where he made hym to haue grete sport. And there y^e Kinge made hym ryde on his owen horsse, a fayre hoby, the w^{ch} the Kinge gave hym. Item, there in the Parke the Kinge gave hym⁵ a royall crosbowe, the strynges of sylke, the case couered w^t velvette of the Kinges colers, and his armes and bages thervpon. The heddes of y^e quarrelles were gilt. The Kynges dynner was ordeined at the lodge. Before dynner they keld no game, saving a doo, y^e w^{ch} the Kinge gave to y^e seruantes of y^e lorde Grutehuse. And when the Kinge had dyned, they wente a huntinge agayne. And by the castell were founden certein dere lyinge ; and what w^t greyhoundes and what were ren⁶ to dethe w^t bok houndes, there were slayne halfe a dosen bokes, the w^{ch} the Kinge gave to the sayde lorde Grutehuse.

¹ *A game resembling bowls.*² *Closh, or ninepins.*³ *to them om. J.*⁴ *As an antidote to poison.*⁵ *hym om. J.*⁶ som w^t greyhoundes and som renne A.

By y^t tyme it was nere night, yet the Kinge shewed hym his garden and Vineyard of Plesyre, and so tourned into y^e Castell agayne, where they herde evensonge in theire chambers.

The quene dyd order a grete banket in her owne chambre. At the w^{ch} banket were the Kinge, the quene, my lady Elizabeth the Kinges eldest doughter, the Duches of Excester, my lady Ryuers, and the lorde Gruthuse, settinge at oone messe, and at the same table sat the Duke of Bokingham, My lady his wyff, w^t diuers other Ladyes, whose names I have not,¹ My Lorde Hastings, Chamberleyn to the Kinge, My lorde Barnes, chamberleyn to the quene, John Grutehuse son to y^e forsaide lorde, M^r George Bart, secretory to the Duc of Burgoine, Loys Stacy, asher² to the Duke of Burgoine,³ [and] George Mytteney: also certeyn nobles of the kinges owne courte. Item, there was a syde table, at the w^{ch} sat a grete vewe of ladyes, all on y^e one syde. Also in the vtter chamber sat the quenes gentlewomen all on one syde. And at the other syde of the table agenest them sat as many of the lorde Gruthuse servauntes: as touchinge to y^e abundant welfare, lyke as hyt ys accordinge to soche a banket. And when they had sopt, my lady Elizabeth, the Kinges eldest doughter, daunsed w^t the Duke of Bokingham: and dyuers other ladyes also. And aboute ix of the clocke the king and the quene w^t her ladies and gentlewomen brought y^e sayde lorde Grutehuse to iij chambers of Pleasance, all hanged and besyne w^t whyt sylke and lynnyn-clothe, and all y^e flowers couered w^t carpettes. There was ordeined a bed for hym self of as good downe as coulede be thought, the shetes of Raynes, also fyne fustyan, the counterpoynt cloth of gold furred w^t ermyne, y^e tester and y^e seler⁴ also shynyn⁵ clothe of gold, curtens of whyt sarsenette: as for his bed shete⁶ and pelowes [they] were of the quenes owen ordinaunce. In y^e ij^{de} chamber was an other of astate, the w^{ch} was alle whyt. Also in the same chamber was made a couche w^t fether beddes, hanged w^t a tent knit lyke a nett; and there was y^e coberd. Item, in the iij^{de} chamber was ordeined a bayne or ij, w^{ch} were couered w^t tentes of whyt clothe. And when the Kinge and the quene, w^t all her ladyes and gentlewomen, had shewed hym these chambres, they turned agayne to theire owne chambres, and lefte y^e said lorde Grutehuse there, accompanied w^t my lorde chamberleyn, w^{ch} dispoyled hym and wente bothe to gether in the bane. Also there was Syr John a Parr, John Grutehuse, son to y^e saide lorde, Mayster George Bartte, Secretory to the Duke of Burgoine, Loys,

¹ whose . . . not om. A.

⁴ celer A.; the canopy.

² usher; archer J.

⁵ sheving J.

³ Bokyngham J.

⁶ bedd sute A.

Jeys, Mytteney, and those seruauntes that were longinge to theire chambres. And when they had been in theire baines as longe as was theire playsir, they had grene gynger, dyuers cyryppes, comfyttes and Ipocras, and then they wente to bedde. And on y^e morne he toke his conie or leve¹ of the Kinge and the quene, and turned to Westmynster agayne, accompanied w^t certain knyghtes, esquiers and oder the Kinges servauntes, home to his logging.²

And the sonday next foloinge³ the King gave hym a gowne of cloth of golde furreyd.

And on seynt Edwardes day⁴ opynly in y^e parlement chamber he was commended to the Kinges good grace by y^e speker of y^e parlement: were opynly by the iij estates of y^e Realme, y^e Kinge, beinge crowned, gyrd a sword about hym and creat hym Erle of Wynchester: M^r Willm. Atclif, y^e kinges secretery, red openly his patent y^t all folke might hear yt. Also he bare y^e Kinges sworde y^t day tyll the Kyng went to dynner. Y^e King kept y^t day his estate in y^e Whyt Hall, where he dyned on the left of y^e King at his owne table.

M^m. he gave to the Kinges ofycers of armes viij^{oo} doble plakkys of mony of Flaunders.

Larges. Larges. Larges.

¹ toke his cuppe A.

² Here A. has: And on Sainte Edwardes daye opynly in the parlement chamber was create Erle of Wynchester. Finis: thus omitting the subsequent passage given above.

³ either 4th or 11th October.

⁴ 13th October.

XVI. CALENDAR OF FIFTEENTH CENTURY LETTERS

CONTAINED IN THE REPORTS OF THE ROYAL COMMISSION ON HISTORICAL MANUSCRIPTS.

[In this Calendar the Letters are marked E. F. or L. according as the originals are in English, French, or Latin. The Christ Church, Canterbury, Letters in the Ninth Report, which have since been printed elsewhere—see p. 218 above—are not included.]

Reign of Henry IV.

1405. April. Thomas of Lancaster, Admiral of England, to Mayor &c. of Rye. Summons for ships to join him at Sandwich on 20th April. (Summary in English) F. 5th Report, 501.

Reign of Henry V.

1413. 8th Nov. Edmund Stafford, Bishop of Exeter, to the Dean and Chapter. On the measures to be taken for the suppression of Lollardy. (Summary) L. Various Collections, iv. 40.
1415. 6th July. Henry Beaufort to William Filliol. On behalf of his secretary Richard Petteworth. E. Lord Middleton's MSS., 102.
- Nov. Official Bulletin on the Victory of Agincourt (An English translation; see pp. 89, 215 above) L. and F. Various Collections, iv. 195-7.
- 1419 (?).¹ John Albon to his master Thomas Palmer at Holt of the Hill. The King was in good health the xxvij day of July and at Agincourt the day above written. When the French knew of his coming they burnt all the towns between Calais and Agincourt. The French King is at Paris. Our King has made a vow that he will not abide two nights in a town till he know whether the French King will give him battle or not. E. 2nd Report, 94.

¹ The editor assigns the letter to 1417, which is manifestly impossible. The reference to the French King indicates that the date was before the Treaty of Troyes, otherwise it would be natural to assign it to 1421, during June of which year Henry must have passed near Agincourt. We may dismiss 1418, since in July—August Henry was entering on the siege of Rouen. In July, 1419, Henry was at Mantes; he might possibly have visited Agincourt between 18th August, when he left Pontoise, and 21st August, when he reached Rouen. If the letter is copied correctly the date is a puzzle.

Reign of Henry VI.

1433. 1st April. Walter, Lord Hungerford. Letters appointing persons to treat for the ransom of his prisoner John de Vendôme, Vidame of Chartres. E. 15th Report, x. 162.
1435. 28th May. Letters of Privy Seal to the Community of Beverley. For a loan on the occasion of the Council of Arras. E. Beverley MSS. 22.
- 2nd July. Reply from the Community of Beverley pleading to be excused. E. id. ib.
- 8th July. Robert Rolleston, Wardrober, to the Community of Beverley, remonstrating with them. E. id. ib.
1436. Feb. A letter of news from Ghent as to the Duke of Burgundy's plans and his intention to besiege Calais. E. Various Collections, iv. 197.
- 14th Feb. Letters of Privy Seal summoning the Mayor of Salisbury to attend at Westminster. E. id. iv. 198.
- 14th Feb. Letters of Privy Seal to Mayor &c. of Salisbury. For a loan for the French War. E. id. ib.
- 26th March. Letters of Privy Seal to Mayor &c. of Salisbury. Asking them to send men for the defence of Calais. E. id. ib.
1439. 24th June. Letter under royal signet to bailiffs of Bridport. Against the giving of liveries. E. 6th Report, App. 1. 496-7.
1440. 24th April. Yuon Corre to Ralph, Lord Cromwell. On behalf of his master Bernard Angevin, Sire de Roasan. F. id. 1. 235.
- ? A complaint to the King's Council of the Duchy of Lancaster. 12th Report, iv. 1. (Ruiland MSS.) 1447. 2nd April. Bailiffs of Oswestry to Bailiffs of Shrewsbury. On behalf of Gruff of Kalcote. E. 15th Report, x. 46.
1448. 15th March. From the Abbot of Malmesbury. A general letter as to manor of Mellesburgh and Wokehole. E. 8th Report, i. 639.
- 1st May. John Greyve, collector of alms for the haven-making of Bridport, to his employers. E. 6th Report, i. 496.
1449. 20th May. Queen Margaret. An award as to the taking of the liveries of Viscount Beaumont and Lord Ferrers of Groby and consequent disputes at Leicester. E. 8th Report, i. 414-5.
1450. June. Petition of the Commons of Kent. E. id. i. 266-7. (See pp. 359-61 above.)
- October. The Duke of York's first Bill to the King. E. Beverley MSS. 32.
- October. His Second Bill. E. id. 33. (See pp. 366-7 above.)

- 1450 October. The King's Reply to the Duke of York. E. id. 34.
 1451. 12th June. Appointment for Surrender of Bordeaux. E. id. 31.
 1452. 8th July. Bond by Sir William Manypenny to the Bishop of Glasgow. E. id. 35.
 1453. 19th August. John Tanner to Prior of Christchurch, Canterbury. The Queen is with child. E. Various Collections, i. 223.
 1456. 22nd Dec. Richard, Duke of York, to Charles VII, King of France. As to the proposed 'mariage de Madame Magdalene avecqs mon aisne fils Edward, Comte de la Marche'. F. 9th Report, ii. 410.
 1457. 7th Dec. Queen Margaret to chapter of Exeter. Recommends her chancellor, John Hals, for election to the Deanery. E. Various Collections, iv. 85.
 1460. 24th August. Safe-conduct from the Earls of March, Warwick, and Salisbury for John Davy. E. 3rd Report, 315.
 — 11th Sept. Letters of Privy Seal to Community of Beverley. From Kenilworth. As to great assemblies in the North. Summons them to render aid. E. Beverley MSS. 139.

Of uncertain date.

- Before 1442. 8th Oct. Edmund Lacy, bishop of Exeter, to Earl of Huntingdon. For his help for the church of Exeter. E. Various Collections, iv. 82.

Reign of Edward IV.

1462. 21st Dec. David Lloyd to William Oteley, bailiff of Shrewsbury. For the relief of his servant. E. 15th Report, x. 47.
 1463. 25th May. John, Lord Clinton and Say, to the Mayor &c. of Folkestone. Begg them not to suffer Thomas Banns, 'late pretended Prior of our Priory of Folkestone,' to disturb Henry Ferrers in his possession of the Priory. E. 5th Report, 590.
 — 27th May. 'The Kyngs Moder, Duchesse of York,' to Mayor &c. of Folkestone. On behalf of her Chaplain Thomas Banys. E. id. ib.
 — 28th May. John, Lord Clinton, to Mayor &c. of Folkestone. Prays them to disregard any letters from the King or my lady of York. He will hold them harmless, and they must maintain the liberties of the Ports. E. id. ib.
 — 29th May. John, Lord Clinton, to the Mayor of Folkestone. Marvels at his disposition with that untrue monk. The mayor will have cause to repent, if he continues to set his commandment at naught. E. id. 591.
 — 1st June. The Official of the Court of Canterbury to Morgan Ayssheley, William Barbour and others. Henry Ferrers, who is - rightfully possessed of the Priory, has appealed to the Apostolic See. Thomas Banns is excommunicated for an unmentionable offence: he is cited to appear at St. Mary Arches in London. L. id. 591.

1463. 5th June. John, Lord Clinton, to Mayor &c. of Folkestone. On behalf of the King and of the warden of the Ports orders the arrest of Thomas Banns. L. id. 592.
- 11th June. Thomas Bouchier, Archbishop of Canterbury, to Mayor &c. of Folkestone. Thanks them for acting in accordance with his own and the King's letters. Lord Clinton had acted wrongly and they are encouraged to oppose him. E. id. ib.
- June. Parts of two letters from Lord Clinton. Charges them not to doubt the Archbishop of Canterbury or any other. Repeats the accusation against Banns. E. id. ib.
1467. May. Alice, Duchess of Suffolk, to Sir Symon Brails, her chaplain. On private business. E. 8th Report, i. 629.
1470. 4th October. George, Duke of Clarence, to Henry Vernon. From Tewkesbury. He will be at Lichfield on Tuesday next, and at Ashbourn on the following Monday. E. 12th Report, iv. 2. (Ruiland MSS.)
1471. 15th March. Clarence to Henry Vernon. From Bristol. Sends his thanks to the Countess of Salisbury. Vernon is to have his tenants ready in defensible array. E. id. ib.
- 16th March. Clarence to Henry Vernon. From Wells. He is to keep spies on the Earls of Northumberland and of Shrewsbury, and lord Stanley. King Edward is reported to have sailed towards the Humber. He is to obtain news. E. id. iv. 3.
- 23rd March. Clarence to Henry Vernon. From Wells. Summons him to come in defensible array at once. E. id. ib.
- 25th March. The Earl of Warwick to Henry Vernon. Edward, 'the King's great enemy, rebel and traitor,' has landed in the North. Vernon is to join him at Coventry. E. id. ib.
- 30th March. Clarence to Henry Vernon. From Malmesbury. Thanks him for his news; he should hasten his coming. E. id. iv. 4.
- 2nd April. Clarence to Henry Vernon. From Burford. He is to join him at Banbury. E. id. ib.
- 7th May. Edward IV to Henry Vernon. From Tewkesbury. Summons him to join him at Coventry on Thursday next. E. id. ib.
- 8th May. Edward IV to Henry Vernon. From Worcester. He is to come at once. They have won a great victory; but there are murmurs and commotions of the Commons in diverse parts. E. id. iv. 5.

1471. 10th May. Clarence to Henry Vernon. From Coventry. Announces their victory; presses him to come at once. E. id. ib.
- 19th December. Edward IV to Mayor &c. of Salisbury. As to a dispute between the city and bishop of Salisbury. E. Various Collections, iv. 209.
1475. 1st October. Edward IV to Duke of Milan. Safe-conduct for Anthony, Earl Rivers, who is going to Rome. L. 9th Report, ii. 411.
1478. 5th March. Thomas Langton to Prior of Christchurch, Canterbury. As to events in London (mutilated). E. Various Collections, i. 214-15.
1479. 31st January. Reginald Goldstone to William Sellyng, prior of Christchurch, Canterbury. Mr. Fyneux advises that if you will spend money among men-of-law of his counsel your matter will speed. E. id. i. 232.
1481. 20th October. Edward IV to Henry Vernon. From Nottingham. As to a dispute between Robert Plumpton and his nieces. E. 12th Report, iv. 6 (Rutland MSS.).
- Of uncertain date.*¹
- 11th October. Cecily, Duchess of York, 'the King's moder,' to William Waynflete. For her servant William Stephen. E. 8th Report, i. 268.
- After 1470. 25th August. Edward IV to Prior of Christchurch, Canterbury. Thanks him for service to John Grauntford, usher of our chamber. E. Various Collections, i. 223.
- Before 1476. 9th August. John Scott to Prior of Christchurch, Canterbury. From Calais. Yesterday there was news that the Duke of Burgundy was defeated at Terouanne. To-day there is more certain news that he has the field. E. id. i. 232.
- After 1480. 5th May. Edward IV to Henry Vernon. From London. As to a dispute between Vernon and John Stanley and William Troutbeck. E. 12th Report, iv. 6 (Rutland MSS.).
- 11th July. Edward IV to Henry Vernon. From Westminster. On the same matter. E. id. iv. 7.

Reign of Richard III.

1483. 13th October. Letters under sign manual to Mayor &c. of Southampton. Summons to be ready against the Duke of Buckingham. E. 11th Report, iii. 103.²

¹ In 12th Report, iv. 8-11 (Rutland MSS.), there are a number of private letters of the latter part of the fifteenth century. One from E. Jenney to Richard Roos (circa 1476) mentions Mr. Paston; two others were written (before 1483) by William Paston to Mr. Roos.

² In the 11th Report, iii. 97-106, there are given a number of Letters of Privy 1485. 5th April. Letters under sign manual to Mayor &c. of Southampton. Against those who 'dailly sowe sede of noyse and dislaunder agenst our person'. E. id. iii. 106.

— 11th August. Richard III to Henry Vernon. From 'Beskewood'. His enemies have landed at Milford. Vernon is to join him. E. 12th Report, iv. 7 (Rulland MSS.).

Seal between 1457 and 1485. Those noted above are the only ones of political importance. Some of the others relate to commercial matters.

XVII. ON THE MUTABILITY OF WORLDLY CHANGES

This is given here as being the only Political Poem referred to in the text which has not already been printed. It comes from Rawlinson C. 813 f. 11 in the Bodleian Library, where it occurs amongst a Sixteenth Century collection of poetical pieces. It was, however, clearly written about 1460, since the fall of Eleanor Cobham in 1441 is described as having happened within these twenty years. The faulty versification of the last two stanzas suggests that the author was not a practised poet. His purpose in writing was to point the moral, and the historical allusions only occur incidentally. In the story of Eleanor Cobham there is nothing fresh. John Beaufort returned from his long captivity in 1438, and married Margaret Beauchamp, by whom he was father of the Lady Margaret. In March 1443 he was made Duke of Somerset, and given the command in France. He was not successful, and when he returned home next year was accused of treachery and forbidden to come to Court. This is the story of the Croyland Chronicler (Gale, Scriptores, i. 514), who adds that in chagrin at his disgrace he committed suicide, whence it was said, Bis binis annis vix stabat pompa Johannis. It seems to have been felt that there was something of a tragedy in his fate. The story that he was killed by a bull is not found elsewhere. The two stanzas on Humphrey of Gloucester are remarkable for the allegation that his arrest was due to the revelation of information obtained under the secrecy of the confessional. This is not authenticated by any other authority, and is probably only a piece of scandal, aimed perhaps at some bishop who owed his promotion to Suffolk.

Musyng vppon the mutabilitie

Of worldlye changes and grett vnstables,

And me remembryng howe grett aduersite

I have seen ffalle to men off hye noblenes,

First welthe and then ageyn distres,

Nowe vppe nowe downe as Fortune turnethe her whele,

Best is me thinke for mannys sikernes

To trust in God and labour to doo well.

We nede not make to kepe the Croniclez olde

Off the Romans nor Bockas¹ tragedye

To Rede the Ruyen and ffallys manyffolde

Off princys grett putt to dethe and miserye

¹ Boccaccio.

In sondrye landes, ffor wee have hardelye
 Here in thys lande wth in the xx yere
 As wonder changez been before our eye
 As euer I trowe before thys any were.

Of whiche I shall reherse such as I can,
 Though I in ordre sett them nott a right.
 As I trowe a duchess ffirst began,
 Which Elinor off Cobeham sumtyme hight,
 Or she were weddyd to that ffamose knyght,
 Off Glocestir the noble Duke Humffrey,
 Whose soll Jesu bringe to p^tjoyfull hight,
 That you hym bothe humblye beseche and praye.

Thys ladye was Soo proude and highe of harte,
 That she hir selfe thought pereles of estate;
 And yet higher fayn she wold have starte,
 Butt sodenlye she fell as was hir fate
 And was arested, all dismayde and mate;¹
 For Socerye and eke for Suspection
 Of treason wrought ageynst the King algate,²
 And thervvpon committed vnto prisone :

And after broughte to the courte Spirituall
 Before the bisshoppes, and ther of Sorcerye
 Founden gylte In poyntes specyall :
 She was Injoynd in London opynlye
 To doo hir penaunce, and soo full petyously
 She itt perfformed ; and after was she sent Vnto a castell to abide perpetuallye ;
 And soo she dyd tyll dethe away hir hent.³

The noble duke of Somersett, John,
 Whome all Brytayne and also Normandye
 Hadde In grett drede, and his enemyez euerichone,
 For his manhode, puissaunce and cheualrye,
 When he was weddyd and in estate most hye
 In the best age right and as hys fortune was,
 The bull to grounde hym cast cruellye,
 That after soone he dyed, such was hys grace.

¹ confused.² in all manner of ways.³ took.

The noble duke of whiche I spake before,
 I meane Humfrey of Glocestre alsoo,
 Whiche of thys lande was lymyted protector,
 And made the duke of Burgoyne and muche moo
 To flee ffrom Caleys, vnto hys highe honor,
 Vppon a tale made by a bisshoppe, a brybor,¹
 A wretched prest as deeffe nere as a stoune,
 Whiche he shuld haue harde as a confessor,

And to the King he vttered itt anon :

Wherefore att Burye in a ffull parlyament
 By a grett lorde, or he came to the towne,
 He was arrestede by the commandement
 Off Kynge Henrye, ffor Suspection off treason
 Thought and wrought ageynst the crowne;
 For shame and angwishe off whiche, Jeleoussy
 I-toke hym sone after and soo lowe brought hym I-downe,
 That in short while after I-caused hym to dye.

¹ a thief.

INDEX

- A
- Aachen (Akun), 355.
- Abbeville, 181 n., 319, 381.
- Aberystwith, 22.
- Acson, Robert, 378.
- Acton, Sir Roger, Lollard leader, 284, 285, 293, 324, 325.
- Adams, William, his Chronicle of Bristol, 111.
- Adys, Miles, 103.
- Agincourt: march to, 89; battle of, 17, 47, 55, 88, 116, 126, 179, 277, 286, 316, 317, 326, 327; archers at, 66, 123, 317, 326; killed at, 32, 286, 317, 327; prisoners at, 105, 286, 317, 327; ballads of, 3, 116, 134, 238-40, 299; memorial verses on, 50; official bulletin of, 89, 215, 294; mentioned, 34, 45, 49, 53, 54, 65, 73, 74, 141. Visit to, by Henry V, 225, 389.
- Albany, Dukes of, see Stewart.
- Albon, John, 212 n., 225, 389.
- Albret, Charles d', Constable of France, 286, 317, 327.
- Alcock, John, bishop of Rochester, 382.
- Alenap Meredithap Philip Madock, 364.
- Alençon (Launson), Bastard of, 321.
- Alençon, Jean I, Duke of, 286, 317, 326.
- Alençon, Jean II, Duke of, 321.
- Aleyn, Thomas, sheriff of London, 294.
- Alington, or Alynton, William, Speaker of the House of Commons, 382, 388.
- Alnwick, 35, 283.
- Arnold, William, bishop of Lincoln, 370.
- Amiens (Amice), 54, 319.
- Amundesham, John, his Annales, 151.
- Ancient Correspondence*, at the Record Office, its character and contents, 209, 210, 215, 216.
- Anjou, English loss of, 164, 361.
- Annales Henrici Quarti*, manuscript of, 13, 15, 19; relation of, to Walsingham's Historia Anglicana, 16, 19; criticism of, 19-21; errors in, 20, 22; mentioned, 25, 87.
- Annales Londonienses*, 71.
- Annales Ricardi Secundi*, 19, 25, 87.
- Annals*, see Bermondsey, Gloucester, Sherborne, St. Albans, Waltham.
- Anne Neville, Queen of Richard III, 101, 378.
- Anne, daughter of Edward IV, 187.
- Anselowe in Denmark, Bishop of, 15.
- Anstis, John, Garter King of Arms, 68, 379, 380 n.
- Antiquis Legibus, Liber de*, 71.
- Antony, Mounsy, see Thoulangeon, Antoine de.
- Appleby, 343.
- Arbury, see Erdebury.
- Archæologia*, historical pieces printed in: account of Revolution of 1399, 87; Page's Siege of Rouen, 116, 117; ballads, 125, 241, 246, 247; French version of Arrival of Edward IV, 176; Blue-mantle's Record, 379.
- Argentan, 306.
- Armagnac, Bernard, Count of, 328.
- Armagnac, Jean, Count of, 121, 221.
- Armetesworth, 339.
- Arnold, Morris, 385.
- Arnold, Richard, his Chronicle, 72, 88, 106, 263.
- Arnold, Thomas, his Memorials of St. Edmund's Abbey, 160, 223, 224.
- Arras, Conference of, 124, 390.
- Arrivall of Edward IV, The*; criticism of, 175; French versions of, 176; preservation of, due to Stow, 270; use of, by Waurin, 137; use of, by later writers, 176, 270, 273; possible author of, 183; mentioned, 248.
- Artas, Janico d', 22.
- Arthur the Squire, 26.
- Arthur (Arteys), bastard son of Humphrey of Gloucester, 364.
- Arundel, 343.
- Arundel, Earls of, see Fitzalan.
- Arundel, Sir Richard, 289, 318.
- Arundel, Thomas, Archbishop of Canterbury, restored to archbishopric in 1399, 275, 312; crowns Henry IV, 279; his adventures in Jan. 1400, 218, 276; degrades a priest for heresy, 276; in Parliament of 1404, 16; crowns Henry V, 284; takes part in suppression of Lollard rising, 324; death, 14, 293, 325; a letter written by, 218; Adam Usk in his service, 34.
- Ashbourne, Derbyshire, 392.
- Ashby, George, his Poems, 232, 235.
- Ashley, John, 94.
- Asteley, Sir John, K.G., 380, 381.
- Athol, Earl of, see Stewart, Walter.
- Audley, lord, see Tuchet, John.
- Audley, Sir Humphrey, 377.
- Audley, Sir James, 377.

Aumarle, Duke of, see Edward.
 Augier, G. J., his French Chronicle of London, 71.
 Austria, son of the Duke of, 351.
 Aylmere, John, another name for Jack Cade, 365.
 Ayscough, or Ascu, William, bishop of Salisbury, marries Henry VI and Margaret of Anjou, 353; his unpopularity, 370; murdered in 1450, 158, 344; 346-9, 366.
 Ayssheley, Morgan, 391.

B

Baawmore, Scots defeated at, 60.
 Badby, John, Lollard, 16, 30 n., 75, 230.
 Baggeley, Thomas, Lollard, 150.
 Baginton, Earl of Northumberland imprisoned at, 35, 282.
 Baginton Hall, 'Fabian's MS.' formerly there, 83.
 Bagot, Sir William, 282.
 Baker, John, chaplain of Cardinal Beaufort, 262.
 Baker, Richard, Lollard, 295.
 Baldock, Herts., church burnt, 352.
 Baldock, Walter, see Launde, Prior of.
 Bale, John, his account of Peter Basset, 68; of Robert Bale, 95.
 Bale, Robert, his Chronicle, 79, 81, 91, 95, 96.
 Ballads, characteristics of, 11, 237, 238; of Agincourt, 89, 116, 238-40, 299; of Calais, 126, 240, 241; of Wars of the Roses, 129, 245-8; on the downfall of Richard III, 249-52.
 Bamburg, 369.
 Banbury, 356, 392.
 Banister, Ralph, ballad on, 249.
 Banns, Thomas, prior of Folkestone, 223 n., 391, 392.
 Bar, Edouard, Duke of, 286, 317, 326.

Barbasan, Sire de, 61, 67.
 Barbour, William, 391.
 Barcelona, 51, 52.
 Bardolf, William, lord, his treason, 277, 283, 311, 315; his death, 283.
 Barnarde, Sir Edmund, 377.
 Barnet, battle of, 172, 175, 248; killed at, 374, 376; the Pastons present at, 206.
 Barnstaple, 343.
 Baron, Henry, 378.
 Barreners, see Berners.
 Bart, George, secretary to Charles the Bold, 387.
 Basle, Council of, 222.
 Basset, John or Peter, his Acta Henrici Quinti, 68, 69; use of, by Hall, 262.
 Bassyngborn, a servant of Humphrey of Gloucester, 364.
 Bath, 343.
 Bath, bishops of, see Bekyn-ton, Thomas; Stafford, John; Stillington, Robert.
Battle of Agincourt, The, 238-40; incorrectly attributed to Lydgate, 232.
 Battlefield, College at, 281.
 Baugé, battle of, 42, 130, 141, 146; killed and prisoners at, 290, 295, 320.
 Bavaria, Louis, Duke of, marries Blanche of Lancaster, 314; at siege of Melun, 319.
 'Bayes', 300, 307.
 Bayeux, siege of, in 1417, 300, 306.
 Beauchamp Henry, Duke of Warwick, 353, 376; Suffolk accused of contriving his death, 361.
 Beauchamp of Powyke, John, lord, 368, 373.
 Beauchamp, Margaret, 395.
 Beauchamp, Richard, Earl of Warwick, receives Sigismund at Calais, 69; fights with a carrack off Calais, 48; serves in France, 1417-20, 307, 318, 319; employed in embassies, 195, 330, 332, 335; commended by Hardyng, 147; patron of Lydgate, 5, 231; Life of,

by John Rous, 185; spoke French, 195.
 Beauchamp, Richard, lord Bergavenny, afterwards Earl of Worcester, at sieges of Rouen and Melun, 318, 319; killed at Meaux, 319.
 Beauchamp, Richard, bishop of Salisbury, 348, 349.
 Beauchamp, Thomas, Earl of Warwick, 275.
 Beaufitz, see Beauvais.
 Beaufort, Edmund I, Duke of Somerset, previously Earl of Mortain and Marquis of Dorset, at siege of Rouen, 318; at battle of Baugé, 295, 320; at defence of Calais in 1436, 125, 147, 321; recovers Harfleur, 339, 341; made Marquis of Dorset, 353; charged with loss of Normandy, 372; sent to the Tower, but released, ib.; with Henry VI in Kent, ib.; opposition to York, 136 n., 202, 297, 298, 373; killed at St. Albans, 345, 349; his answer on the credence sent to the King of Scots, 369; praised by Polydore Vergil, 255.
 Beaufort, Edmund II, Duke of Somerset, beheaded at Tewkesbury, 377.
 Beaufort, Henry, bishop of Winchester and Cardinal, made Chancellor, 284; speech in Parliament in 1416, 48; one of the guardians of Henry VI, 278, 296; his dispute with Humphrey of Gloucester in 1425-6, 82, 86, 88, 106, 263; supplies troops for French war, 124; crowns Henry VI at Paris, 320 n., 351; charges made against, by Humphrey of Gloucester, 106, 221, 263; account of, by John Baker, 262; other contemporary references, 157, 243; character of, by Hall, 265; Suffolk charged with his death, 361; letters written

- by, 82, 217, 220 n., 389; patron of Hardyng, 5.
- Beaufort, John I, Earl of Somerset, at battle of Mark, 123; escorts Blanche of Lancaster to Cologne, 314; his death, 315; buried at Canterbury, 339, 340.
- Beaufort, John II, Earl and afterwards Duke of Somerset, at siege of Melun, 319; taken prisoner at Bauge, 290, 295, 320; released, 339, 340; created Duke, 341, 353; his ill-success in France, and death, 341; said to have been killed by a bull, 395, 396; Suffolk charged with his death, 359, 361.
- Beaufort, John III, killed at Tewkesbury, 374, 376, 377.
- Beaufort, Margaret, 395.
- Beaufort, Thomas, Earl of Dorset and Duke of Exeter, his alleged advice at the Parliament of Leicester in 1414, 120, 121; in command at Harfleur, 48, 285, 316, 325, 328, 329; at siege of Rouen, 318; at Melun, 319; in command at Paris, 336; one of the guardians of Henry VI, 278, 296; his retinue at Verneuil, 321; death and burial, 296.
- Beaumont, John, Viscount, councillor of Henry VI in 1452, 373; at battle of Northampton, 246; mentioned, 390.
- Beauvais (Beaufitz), 319.
- Bec Hellouin, 41.
- Bedford, 343.
- Bedford, Dukes of, see George; John; Tudor, Jasper.
- Bedwin, Wilts., 343.
- Beef, Sir Philip le, 94.
- Bekynston, Thomas, bishop of Bath and Wells, an Oxford scholar, 5, 6; his Official Correspondence, 221, 222; other letters, 223.
- Bellême (Belham), 307.
- Bellenden, or Balantyne, John, 262.
- Benedictines, Chapter of the Order in 1421, 18, 46, 311.
- Benooth, Hugo, 364.
- Bentley, Samuel, his Excerpta Historica, 174, 179 n., 208, 226, 369.
- Benvile, Normandy, 301, 303.
- Berden Priory, Essex, 216.
- Bergavenny, lord, see Beauchamp, Richard.
- Berkhampstead, 363.
- Bermondsey, 339, 340, 352.
- Bermondsey Annals*, 37.
- Berners, lord, see Bouchier, John.
- Berwick, siege of, in 1405, 22, 29 n., 35, 283; Edward IV at, 237; held by Scots, 159.
- Beskwood, 394.
- Bethlehem, Charterhouse at Sheen, 323.
- Bettison, Thomas, 209.
- Beverley, Henry V at, 290; letters, &c., in archives of, 360, 390, 391.
- Beverley, John, Lollard, 293.
- Beynton, Master, 378.
- Bingham, William, his reasons for founding Clare College, 195.
- Birchfield, —, executed at Tewkesbury, 378.
- Bishopthorpe, Yorks., 282.
- Blackheath, Jack Cade at, 344, 347, 371, 372; Henry VI and Richard of York at, 167, 298.
- Blades, William, his edition of Caxton's Polychronicon, 114.
- Blakamore, Baron de, an impostor, 151.
- Blakeney, John, 365.
- Blakeney, Robert, Whetamsted's Register, incorrectly attributed to, 154.
- Blakman, John, his Life of Henry VI, 149.
- Blanche of Lancaster, 314, 315 n.
- Blangy, 381.
- Bletchingley, Surrey, 343.
- Blomefield, Francis, used the Paston Letters, 197.
- Blore Heath, 167.
- Blount, Sir John, 289.
- Blount, Walter, lord Mountjoy, 380, 383.
- Bluemantle Pursuivant, his Record, 178, 379–88; his mission to Charles the Bold, 381, 382.
- Blunt, Sir Walter, 350.
- Bocking, John, his correspondence with John Paston, 200, 203.
- Bodmin, 343.
- Bohun, Joan, Countess of Hereford, 126, 276.
- Bois de Vincennes, John Hardyng at, 141; Henry V dies at, 320, 337.
- Bokelond, William, servant of Humphrey of Gloucester, 364.
- Bollingbroke, Roger, 340, 341.
- Bolton in Craven, 290.
- Boniface IX, Pope, 275.
- Bonville, William, lord, 157.
- Booth, John, bishop of Exeter, 383.
- Booth, Laurence, bishop of Durham, 383.
- Boothe, William, bishop of Lichfield or Chester; satirical verses on, 242, 243; indicted in 1450, 365.
- Bordeaux, 223, 360, 391.
- Bordin, Jean, Gesta Henrici wrongly attributed to, 45.
- Bosworth, battle of, ballads on, 249–52; speeches of leaders at, 263; mentioned, 180, 192, 219.
- Boteler, Ralph, lord Sudely, Yorkist, 368.
- Botiller, see Bouteiller.
- Botoner, William, see Worcester.
- Boucicault, Jean, Marshal of France, 278, 286, 317.
- Boulogne, 181 n., 184 n.
- Bourbon, Bastard of, 307.
- Bourbon, Jean, Duke of, 278, 286, 317, 327.
- Bouchier, Henry, Earl of Essex, 375, 379, 380, 381.
- Bouchier, Humphrey, lord Cromwell, 374, 375.
- Bouchier, Sir Humphrey, son of John, lord Berners, 374.
- Bouchier, John, lord Berners (or Barnes), 374, 375, 380, 381, 387.

- Bourchier, Thomas, archbishop of Canterbury, previously bishop of Ely, negotiates between Henry VI and York in 1452, 368, 373; supports Edward IV, 176; writes on behalf of Thomas Banns, 392.
- Bourchier, William, lord Bourchier and Earl of Eu, 289, 319.
- Bourchier, William, Viscount, son of Earl of Essex, 375.
- Bouteiller (Botiller), Guy le, 318.
- Bowes, Sir William, 320.
- Bowlers or Bowles, Reginald, abbot of Gloucester, and afterwards bishop of Hereford, ambassador to Germany, 355; riot against, at Gloucester, 28; arrested by Richard of York, 162, 297; charges against, 162, 355, 365; acquitted, 216.
- Bowser, see Bourchier.
- Brabant, Antony, Duke of, 278, 286, 317, 326.
- Bracciolini, Poggio, 4.
- Brackley, Friar, correspondent of John Paston, 200, 204.
- Bradford, William, abbot of Sherborne, 347, 348.
- Brails, Simon, 392.
- Bramham Moor, 36, 283, 311.
- Brereton, Humphrey, possible author of The Song of Lady Bessy, 250, 251.
- Brézé (Brasil), Pierre de, 360, 367.
- Bridget, daughter of Edward IV, 187.
- Bridget, St., her Revelations, 230.
- Bridgnorth, Shropshire, 343.
- Bridgwater, Somerset, 343.
- Bridlington, Yorks., 290.
- Bridport, Dorset, 343; the haven-making at, 390.
- Brie, Dr. F. W. D., his edition of the Brut, 114, 115, 123, 132; or its derivation from a London Chronicle, 72; on the date of the continuation to 1419, 115: on the date of the narrative of Harley, 53, 125; on the manuscripts, 115, 135; on the neglect of the London Chronicles, 135; London Chronicles edited by, 70, 77, 79, 85, 91, 92, 94; his Geschichte und Quellen, 114.
- Brief Notes for 1440-43*, 156, 338-41.
- Bristol, Earl of Gloucester beheaded at, 24, 276, 313; connexion of William Worcester with, 162; Sturmy, mayor of, 202; Hervy, recorder of, 378; chronicles of, 111: mentioned, 343, 364, 371, 392.
- Brittany, John, Duke of, 61.
- Brocas, Sir Bernard, 313.
- Bromfield, Denbigh, 281.
- Bromley, John, 272.
- Bromley, Sir Thomas, 272.
- Brooke, Edward, lord Cobham, with Richard of York at Dartford, 298, 368.
- Brooke, John, lord Cobham, supporter of Edward IV, 375.
- Brown, John, sheriff of Worcestershire, 366 n.
- Bruce, John, his edition of The Arrival, 174, 176.
- Bruges, Henry Beaufort at, 220 n.; Edward IV sends news of his success to the Burgomaster, 175; English embassy at, 379, 380.
- Brut*, The, or English Chronicle, early history of, 114, 115; manuscripts of, 115, 120 n., 123, 125, 135, 302; editions of, 114, 137, 138; the Version ending in 1419, 115, 116, 301; the Version of 1430, 115-19, 132, 209-309; the Version of 1461, 119-22, 171; Version of Harley 53, 122-5; of Lambeth 84, 125, 126; evidence for Versions earlier than 1419, 131, 132, 301; sources, 134, 135; ballad and poetical originals, 116-18, 134, 239; relation of, to London Chronicles, 70, 72, 78, 85, 86, 99, 108, 118, 121, 133, 134; to other contemporary Chronicles, 22, 29-31, 53, 61, 64, 66, 148, 157, 179, 338, 350; use of, by Waurin, 136; by sixteenth-century historians, 105, 135, 137, 254, 255, 262; literary importance and interest of, 3, 10, 27, 44, 113, 129, 135, 136, 139, 260, 261; neglect of, by modern writers, 113, 135. See also Caxton's Chronicles, Davies's Chronicle, Latin Brut.
- Bryan, John, sheriff of London, his unhappy fate, 292, 295.
- Buchan, Earl of, see Stewart, John.
- Buck, Sir George, on authorship of the History of Richard III, 185; obtains information from Stow, 270.
- Buckingham, Dukes of, see Stafford.
- Bullfield, the old name for the site of the battle of Shrewsbury, 35, 36, 160, 281, 350, 355.
- Burgate, John, Lollard, 293.
- Burgh, John, gives information of Oldcastle's conspiracy, 36, 284.
- Burgundy, Bastard of, 179, 380.
- Burgundy, Charles the Bold, Duke of, marries Margaret of York, 179, 369; English embassy to, in 1471, 175, 181, 182 n.; Bluemantle's meeting with, 381, 382; embassy from, in 1471, 384; embassy to, in 1472, 384; reported success of, 393; writes in English to Lord Wenlock, 196.
- Burgundy, John the Fearless, Duke of, appeals to England for help against Orleans, 22, 315; meets Henry V and Sigismund at Calais, 330; at conference of Meulan, 212, 332, 333; death, 60, 301, 308, 334; satirical verses on, 233.

Burgundy, Philip the Hardy, Duke of, 28.

Burgundy, Philip the Good, Duke of, a hostage in 1419, 332; makes alliance with Henry V, 278, 334-6; at siege of Melun, 319, 336; letter from, to Henry VI, 82; breaks the English alliance, 55, 57, 321; dread of invasion of England by, 352; his siege of Calais, 216, 240, 241, 321, 390, 397; satirical verses on, 241; mentioned, 61, 291.

Burgundy, Philip, Duke of, and Archduke, visits Henry VII, 369.

Buriell, Lewis de, 138.

Burthull, Walter, 364.

Burton-on-Trent, 281.

Bury St. Edmunds, Parliament of, 1447, and death of Humphrey of Gloucester at, 129, 179, 244, 344, 347; 353, 361, 397; Thomas Beaufort buried at, 296; Chronicle of the Abbey of, 160; Letters from Abbey Register, 223, 224. Abbot of, see Curteys, William.

Busch, Dr. W., on 'Fabian's MS.', 104.

Butler, see also Boteler.

Butler, James, 4th Earl of Ormonde, account of, 65; at siege of Rouen, 318; his stories of Henry V preserved by the 'Translator of Livius', 4, 64-7, 126; his patronage of James Yonge, 5.

Butler, James, Earl of Wiltshire and 5th Earl of Ormonde, 373.

Butler, Sir John, killed in 1430, 291.

Butler, John, 2nd Earl of Wiltshire and 6th Earl of Ormonde, supports Edward IV, 375; K.G., 380; officiates as Chief Butler, 383.

Butler, Sir Thomas, Prior of Kilmainham, 289, 318.

Butler, Sir William, 285.

Butvilane, Sir Thomas, 320.

C

Cade, Jack, story of his early career, 365; narratives of his rebellion, 95, 96, 102, 129, 136, 163, 179, 344, 347; its effect in the West Country, 158, 348; his conditional pardon, 218; his death, 297; documents relating to, 270, 359, 360-2, 369-70; mentioned, 201, 244.

Caen, siege of, in 1417, 17, 124, 217, 289, 301, 304, 305, 331; Henry V at, 4, 66; St. Vincent Ferrier at, 23, 67; St. Stephen's Abbey, 17; fall of, in 1450, 262; bailiff of, see Claremont, Jacques de. Caister Castle, 199, 205.

Calais, Henry V at, in 1415, 277, 286, 294, 299, 317, 318, 327; Sigismund at, in 1416, 48, 49, 278, 287, 300, 330; carrack captured off, 48; siege of, in 1436, 3, 93, 124, 125, 126, 147, 216, 321, 322, 390, 397; ballads on, 134, 240-1; Yorkist lords at, in 1459-60, 138, 204, 245, 369; Warwick and Clarence at, in 1470, 173; Hastings recovers the town, 181 n.; the Sire de Gruithuyse at, 385; Sir John Paston at, 206; the keeping of, 210, 222; its importance, 234; the Staple at, 209, 210. Captains of, see Beaufort, John I; Ratcliffe, Sir John. Marshal of, see Scot, Sir John.

Calne, Wilts., 343.

Cambridge, the town, 343.

The University: foundation of Colleges at, 5, 195, 222; scholars at, 57, 172, 261; John Paston at, 200.

Cambridge, Earl of, see Richard.

Cambridge, William, sheriff of London, 294.

Camden, Sir William, wrote in Latin, 8 n.; his opinion of Stow, [266; owned Lansdowne MS. 212, 310.

Camoyes, Roger, lord, at defence of Calais, 321, 322; with Henry VI in 1452, 373.

Canary Islands, 21.

Canterbury, Henry IV buried at, 38, 277, 284, 315; Thomas of Clarence buried at, 295, 339, 340; muster at, in 1436, 322 n.; Henry VI at, in 1451, 372; ballad set up on the gates of, in 1460, 129, 246; Edward IV at, in 1471, 175, 181 n.; Sire de Gruithuyse at, 385; mentioned, 343; a Chronicle of possible Canterbury origin, 28, 29, 127; a Town Chronicle of, 112 n. — Christ Church Priory at, 385; Letter-books of, 218, 219, 391, 393; Prior of, see Sellyng, William. St. Augustine's Abbey at, 45, 385.

Canterbury, Archbishops of, see Arundel, Thomas; Bourchier, Thomas; Chichele, Henry; Deane, Henry; Kemp, John; Morton, John; Stafford, John.

Canterbury, Court of, 33, 391.

Canterbury, Province of, 362.

Canterbury, Treaty of, 48, 54.

Cantuarienses, Litterae, 218, 219.

Capgrave, John, his Liber de Illustribus Henricis, 38, 39, 50, 149; his Chronicle of England, 39, 169.

Car, Sir William, 378.

Carew, Sir Thomas, 318.

Carlisle, 343.

Caro, J., his Aus der Kanulei Sigismunds, 220.

Carpenter, John, Town-clerk of London, 93.

Castelhon, Poncius de, 289.

Castile, King of, 216.

Catherine of Valois, Queen of England, meets Henry V at Meulan, 333, 334; married, 212, 278, 289, 319, 335, 336; crowned,

- 82, 295, 337; her English progress, 42, 290; rejoins Henry V, 337; erects Henry's tomb, 120; death and burial, 347, 352; her epitaph, 163.
- Catherine, daughter of Edward IV, 125, 187.
- Caudebac, 331.
- Caxton, William; his Chronicles of England, 99, 113-15, 119-22, 128, 134, 137, 138, 172, 262, 265; Caxton not the author, 137; his Polychronicon, 113, 114, 137, 138; compiled the eighth book, 137; other works printed by him, 6, 163.
- Cely Papers*, The, 195, 210, 211.
- Chalons, John, 138.
- Chamberleyn, Sir Roger, 364.
- Chamfrew, see Chauffour.
- Champollion Figeac, A., his Lettres de Rois, &c., 215.
- Charles VI, King of France, his infirmity, 278; at Meulan, 332, 333; at Paris, 389; at Troyes, 335, 336; at Melun, 319, 336; mentioned, 60.
- Charles VII, King of France, as Dauphin negotiates with Henry V, 212, 331, 332; meets John of Burgundy at Montereau, 308, 333, 334; grants safe-conduct for Margaret of Anjou, 218; proposed marriage of his daughter to Edward, Earl of March, 391.
- Charles the Bold, see Burgundy, Duke of.
- Charles of Guienne, 215.
- Charles of Navarre, 289.
- Charles of Orleans, see Orleans.
- Charlton, Edward, lord of Powis, 308.
- Chateau Gaillard, 319.
- Chatterley, Thomas, 368.
- Chaucer, Geoffrey, 5, 7.
- Chauffour (Chamfrew), Henri de, 318.
- Chaundler, Thomas, Warden of New College, Oxford, fosters the Early Renaissance, 6; corresponds with Selyng, 219; and with Bekynton, 222.
- Chechilley, Henry, 364.
- Chef de Caux (Kedecaws), Henry V lands at, 316, 325, 350.
- Cherbourg, siege of, in 1418, 54, 60, 64; nobles killed there, 289.
- Chertsey Abbey, Henry VI buried there, 165 n., 370, 375; his remains translated from, 181.
- Cheshire, 350.
- Chester, 281.
- Chester, bishops of, see Boothe, William; Hales, John.
- Chevy Chase*, ballad, 238, 252.
- Cheyne, Sir John (1404), 16.
- Cheyne, Sir John (1447), 364.
- Chichele, Henry, Archbishop of Canterbury, translated from St. Davids, 14, 293, 325; fictitious speech attributed to, at Leicester Parliament, 120, 121, 264; crowns Henry VI, 351.
- Chichester, 343.
- Chichester, bishops of, see Moleyns, Adam; Pecock, Reginald.
- Chippenham, 343.
- Chronicles, see also Arnold, Richard; Bale, Robert; Brut; Bury St. Edmunds; Capgrave, J.; Caxton, W.; Croyland Chronicle; Davies' Chronicle; Giles' Chronicle; Gregory's Chronicle; Godstow Chronicle; Hardyng, J.; Hall, E.; Holinshed, R.; London. Chronicles of; A Northern Chronicle; A Southern Chronicle; Tewkesbury Chronicle.
- Chronicle for 1444-55*, 158, 342-5.
- Chronicle to 1440*, English, 169.
- Chronicles of White Rose*, 173, 174, 176, 178, 369, 370.
- Chronicon Regum Angliæ*, (Jesus College, Oxford), 36, 160.
- Chrysoloras, Emanuel, 51.
- Cicely, Duchess of York, letters from, 391-3.
- Cirencester, 176, 313.
- Claremont, Jacques de, Bailli of Caen, 367.
- Clarence, Sir John, Bastard of, 295, 320.
- Clarence, Duchess of, see Holland, Margaret.
- Clarence, Dukes of, see George; Thomas.
- Clarendon, Sir Roger, 313.
- Claydon, or Cleydon, John, Lollard, 222 n., 294.
- Clifford, John, seventh lord, marries daughter of Sir Henry Percy, 282; at siege of Melun, 319; dies at Meaux and is buried at Bolton in Craven, 290.
- Clifford, Richard, bishop of Worcester, 314.
- Clifford, Thomas, eighth lord, on the Council, 373; killed at St. Albans, 345, 349.
- Clifford, Sir William, Constable of Berwick, 283.
- Clifton, Sir Gervase, 378.
- Clifton, Sir John, 350.
- Clinton, John, lord, letters written by, 391-2.
- Cobham, lords, see Brooke, and Oldcastle.
- Cobham, Eleanor, Duchess of Gloucester, her arrest, 93, 156, 340; motive for arrest of, 93; supposed to be aimed at her husband, 265; unpopularity of, 84, 157; evidence of sympathy for, 93; her pride, 156, 340, 396; her defence of her use of magic, 93; does penance, 340, 341, 396; imprisoned in Isle of Man, 90; her death, 63; poems on, 242, 396; mentioned, 128.
- Colchester, 343.
- Cole, C. A., editor of Memorials of Henry V, 46, 69.
- Cole, John, 150.
- Collections of a London Citizen*: see Gregory's Chronicle; Page, John.

Collyngbourne, William, his rhyme on Richard III, 249.
 Cologne, 314.
 Comines, Philippe de, his Memoires, 176, 179; use of, by Hall, 262, 263; and by Stow, 270.
 Conflans, 319.
 'Considerans' Chronicle, 164.
 Constance, Council of, 23, 27, 123 n., 223, 301, 308, 330.
 Constantinople, 138; Emperor of, 314.
 Cook, Sir Thomas, 369.
 Cooper, Thomas, his Chronicle of the World, 266.
 Cornwall, Sir John, his wager with the Sire de Gravelle, 42; at siege of Rouen, 318; his son killed at Meaux, 63.
 Cosne-sur-Loire, 337.
 Cotentin, The, English warfare in, 54, 64, 305, 306.
 Cotton, Sir Robert, 49.
 Cotton Manuscripts, official Correspondence contained in, 213, 214.
Le Cotton MS. Galba B i, 220.
 Courtney, Edmund, bishop of Worcester, 315.
 Courtney, Sir Henry, beheaded at Tewkesbury, 378.
 Courtney, John, Earl of Devonshire, 374, 376, 377.
 Courtney, Richard, bishop of Norwich, 285.
 Courtney, Thomas, Earl of Devonshire, his warfare with Lord Bonville, 157; with Richard of York at Dartford, 298, 367, 368.
 Courtney, Walter, beheaded at Tewkesbury, 378.
 Coventry, Parliament at, in 1404, 16, 20, 21; Henry V at, 287; Earl Rivers executed at, 357; mentioned, 216, 392, 393.—Archdeacon of, see Wall, Roger.
 Crayford, Kent, 367.
 Crèvecoeur, Philippe de, 381, 382.

Cricklade, 343.
 Cromwell, Humphrey, lord, see Bourchier.
 Cromwell, Ralph, lord, at siege of Melun, 319; with Henry VI in Kent, 372; letter to, 390.
 Crosby, Sir John, 380 n.
 Crowmer, William (1414), mayor, of London, 73, 293.
 Crowmer, William (1450), sheriff of Kent, 362, 366.
Croyland Chronicle, The: first Continuation of, 37, 150, 179; value of, 180; reference to John Beaufort in, 395: second Continuation of, Sir Clements Markham on, 180; its unity, 181; authorship of, 181, 182; its historical value, 183, 184; its literary quality, 10, 182, 260. Referred to, 46, 110. Manuscripts and editions of, 179.
 Curteys, Peter, Keeper of the Wardrobe to Edward IV, analogy of his career to that of the author of the Croyland Chronicle, 181, 182 n.
 Curteys, William, Abbot of Bury St. Edmunds, letters in his Register, 223-4.

D

Dacre of the South, lord, see Fieunes, Richard.
 Damme, 381.
 Daniel, Thomas, unpopular minister of Henry VI, 200, 243; holds inquiry on treason of John Harries, 371; indicted, 365.
 Darcy, John, lord, 289.
 Dartford, Kent, Richard of York at, 298, 360, 367, 368, 373.
 Dartmouth, Devon, 343.
 David ap Thomas, 364.
 Davies, J. Silvester, English Chronicle edited by, 29 n, 113, 122, 127, 129.
Davies's Chronicle (An English Chronicle from 1377 to 1461), the earlier part of a composite character: its relation to the Continuation of the Eulogium Historiarum, 29, 123, 127 n.; to the Version of the Brut in Harley 53, 122-24, 127; to the Latin Brut, 127-28, 130-31, 328-37 (foot-notes); character and value of the latter part, 128, 129; use of, by Stow, 270; criticism of, by Professor Oman, 113, 114.

 Davies, Robert, his Extracts from the Municipal Records of York, 214, 225.
 Davy, John, 391.
Daw Topias, Reply of Friar, 233.
 Deane, Henry, prior of Lanthony, afterwards archbishop of Canterbury, 355.
 Decembri, Pier Candido, Milanese humanist, corresponds with Humphrey of Gloucester, 4; translated Tito Livio's Vita Henrici into Italian, 52.
 Deeping, Lincolnshire, 179.
 Delabeer, John, bishop of St. Davids, 156, 157.
 De la Warr, lord, see West.
 Delpit, J., his Collection des documents français en Angleterre, 92, 214, 215.
 Delves, Sir John, 377.
 Delves, John, son of foregoing, 377.
 Denham, or Dynham, John, lord, at Sandwich, 204; supports Edward IV, 375; mentioned, 383.
 Denmark, King of, see Eric.
 Deptford, 338.
 Derby, 281, 343, 368.
 Desmond, Earl of, see Fitzgerald.
 Despencer, Constance, lady, 20.
 Despencer, Thomas, Earl of Gloucester, rises in favour of Richard II, 279, 312; beheaded at Bristol, 24, 276, 313.
 Devereux, Walter, lord Ferrers of Chartley, 375, 380.
 Devizes, Wilts., 343.

Devonshire or Devon, Earls of, see Courtney, and Stafford, Humphrey.
 Dieppe, 138, 226, 367.
 Dodenale, —, killed in 1450, 366.
 Dodyng, John, bailiff of Gloucester, 356.
 Don, Sir John, 385.
 Don, Owen, 364.
 Dorchester, 343.
 Dorset, Earls and Marquis of, see Beaufort.
 Douglas, Archibald, Earl of, taken prisoner at Homildon Hill, 280; fights for Percy at Shrewsbury, 281; does fealty to Henry V, 127, 330; killed at Verneuill, 128, 290, 321, 331.
 Douglas, James, son of foregoing, killed at Verneuill, 321.
 Douglas, James, Earl of, at court of Edward IV, 380, 381.
 Douglas, William, of Drumlanrig, killed at Verneuill, 321.
 Dover, Henry V at, 286; Sigismund at, 327; mentioned, 343.
 Downton, Wilts., 343.
 Dreux, 332.
 Dring, Mr. E. H., his edition of The Great Chronicle of London, 71, 80, 81, 83.
 Dublin, Chronicles of, 111, 112.
 Duckett, Sir George, his Charters and Records of Cluni, 45, 226.
 Dudley, lord, see Sutton, John.
 Dugdall, James, monk of Whalley, 279.
 Dunheved (Launceston), 343.
 Dunois, Jean, Count of, Bastard of Orleans, taken prisoner at Whitby, 360, 367.
 Dunstable, Edward IV at, 176; Henry VI at, 373.
 Dunstanburgh, 369.
 Dunwich, 343.
 Duras, Seigneur de, at court of Edward IV, 380, 381.

Durham, 369.
 Durham, bishops of, see Booth, Laurence; Langley, Thomas.
 Dymmok, Sir Thomas, 87.

E

East or Est, Robert, 362.
 East or Est, Thomas, 366.
 East Grinstead, Sussex, 343.
 Easthampstead, 142.
 Edgcote, battle of, 162, 191, 263, 356.
 Edinburgh, Henry IV at, 280.
 Edingdon, Wilts., 347.
 Edmund Crouchback, Earl of Leicester, alleged to be elder brother of Edward I, 146.
 Edmund, Duke of York, 18.
 Education, interest in, 5, 6, 195; extent of, 194-6; evidence of, in correspondence, 194, 227.
 Edward III, King of England, 156.
 Edward IV, King of England, as Earl of March at Calais, 204, 245; his reception in London and accession, 102, 103, 129, 159; at Gloucester, in 1463, 162, 355, 356; intervenes in dispute at Lanthony, 357; conflict of interests in early part of his reign, 205; Polydore Vergil's story of his quarrel with Warwick, 191; his overthrow in 1470, 173, 174; in exile, 382; his restoration, 175, 176, 219; at Barnet, 374; at Tewkesbury, 374-5, 376-7; triumph in London, 375; goes into Kent, ib.; announces his success to Charles the Bold, 181 n.; and to the Burgomaster of Bruges, 175; relations with Louis XI, 184 n.; in Parliament of 1472, 382, 388; entertains Louis de Gruthus, 178, 382, 386-8; hunts in Windsor Park, 386; last days, 186; his funeral, 179; his Court, 178, 179, 379, 383-4, 386-8; holds Garter feast, 380, 381; proposed marriage to Mary of Gueldres, 177; his children, 125, 187; his popularity in London, 98, 247; his mercantile interests, 235; his relations with John Hardyng, 142, 144, 146; William Worcester makes his Collections for, 164; Fortescue writes for, 169; an illuminated Roll in honour of, 165; letters written by, 181 n., 225, 369, 370, 391-3; mentioned, 119, 137, 177. Criticism of, by contemporaries: by Warkworth, 172; in Hearn's Fragment, 176-7; in the Croyland Chronicle, 182, 183; in the History of Richard III, 189. Ballads and verses relating to, 237, 245-9. Narratives of his reign, 98, 100, 102, 159, 170-84, 191. Correspondence relating to his reign, 213, 215, 224, 391-3.

 Edward V, King of England, his birth, 382; K.G., 380; as an infant, 383, 386; his death anticipated in June, 1483, 211; his murder believed in England during lifetime of Richard III, 101, 183 n., 184 n.; believed in France in Jan. 1484, ib.; and reported even earlier, ib.; early Tudor statements as to murder, 101, 184 n., 250; his Grants, 224; his chamberlain, Thomas Vaughan, 383, 386. Narratives of his reign, 100, 102, 183, 185, 189.
 Edward, the Black Prince, 114.
 Edward, Duke of York, formerly Earl of Rutland, and Duke of Aumale, in the Parliament of 1399, 87; informs Henry IV of the intended rising, 312; imprisoned, 29 n.; commands the van at Agincourt, 317; advises that the archers should be provided with stakes, 66, 123,

- 317; killed, 278, 286, 294, 327; a letter written by, 214.
- Edward, Prince of Wales, son of Henry V., his birth, 125, 349; Yorkist slander that he was a bastard, 246; presented to his father, 202; in exile, 226; killed in the field at Tewkesbury, 172, 376, 377; story that he was murdered, 173, 191; Polydore Vergil gives it currency, ib.; his death glossed over in The Ar- rival, 175; buried in the choir at Tewkesbury Abbey, 377; reference to, by Hardyng, 143; George Ashby writes The Policy of a Prince for, 232, 235; Sir John Fortescue writes Governance of England for, 169; letters, &c., written by, 226, 369, 370.
- Egremont, lord, see Percy, Thomas.
- Elizabeth Woodville, Queen of Edward IV, the Earl of Warwick recommends Sir Hugh John for a husband to her, 226; her chamber in the Tower, 218; her constancy in adversity, 382; Edward IV sends a message to her, 176; goes in procession at Westminster, 379; entertains the Sire de Gruthus, 386; gives a banquet in his honour, 387; mentioned, 142.
- Elizabeth of York, Queen of Henry VII, her birth, 99; dances with her father, 386; and with the Duke of Buckingham, 387; Richard III intends to marry her, 101, 250; her history as given in the Song of the Lady Bessy, 250-2.
- Ellis, Sir Henry, his edition of Hardyng's Chronicle, 149; an error of his as to Hardyng, 141 n.; on Lansdowne MS. 204, 144; on the Latin Chronicle in Hardyng's second version, 146; on 'Fabian's MS.' 83 n.; his collection of Original Letters, 174, 211-13, 220, 369; edits the English translation of Polydore Vergil, 259.
- Elmhurst, Thomas, account of, 45, 46; the true author of the Gesta Henrici, 45-7; historical value of the Gesta, 47, 48; its literary quality, 49, 69; manuscripts, 49; Hardyng acquainted with the Gesta, 146; his Liber Metricus, 39, 49, 50; used by Stow, 269; his Cronica Regum, 46, 50; his minor poems, 50, 229; letters written by, 45-6, 226; mentioned, 39, 239.—The Vita et Gesta Henrici Quinti erroneously attributed to, by Hearne, 56, 57. See Pseudo-Elmhurst.
- Eltham, 293, 324.
- Ely, bishops of, see Bouchier, Thomas; Grey, William; Morton, John.
- Ely Brief Notes*, a short chronicle for 1422-1462, 161.
- Elyot, Sir Thomas, first gave the story of Henry of Monmouth and the Chief Justice, 107.
- Emmerig, Dr. Oskar, on the 'tennis-ball' story, 239.
- English Chronicles, see Brut; Chronicles; Davies's Chronicle; London, Chronicles of.
- English Language, strength of, 3, 196; stimulus afforded by growth of national consciousness and the French war, 7, 8, 260; use of, in the early part of the century, 78, 133, 214, 216; in the middle, 62, 64, 69, 169, 214; at the close, 171, 259, 260.—Evidence afforded by the Chronicles of London, 78, 154; by the Brut, 129, 133, 135, 136, 139, 154, 260, 261; by Correspondence and State Papers, 193, 209, 213, 214, 216-18, 220, 222, 223; by contemporary verse, 228; by the influence of English originals on Latin Chronicles, 44, 129, 155, 170; by the educational movement, 195. Somnium Vigilantis (1460), the first political pamphlet in English prose, 168.
- Epistolae Academicae*, 6, 219, 220.
- Erdbury, or Arbury, William Woodcock, Prior of, 213.
- Eric, King of Denmark, 315.
- Erthor Orth, Sir Hugh, 321.
- Essex, Earl of Huntingdon killed in 1400 by the populace of, 276; 'le Wode Monday' (1436) in, 161, 352; rising of 1450 in, 347; Bastard of Fauconberg supported in, 375.
- Essex, Earl of, see Bouchier, Henry.
- Eton College, foundation of, 5, 195, 222; John Blakman, Fellow of, 149; William Paston at, 207, 208; Edward Hall at, 261; a robbery at, 368; Harley MS. 3643, formerly belonged to, 23.
- Eu, Charles d'Artois, Count of, taken prisoner at Agincourt, 317; his redemption, 340, 341.
- Eu, Earl of, see Bouchier, William.
- Eugenius IV, Pope, election of, 119; reverses the bishop of Salisbury's decision at Sherborne, 346, 348; death of, 119, 157, 342, 347, 354.
- Eulogium Historiarum*, Continuation of the, a composite work, 28; its relation to the Southern Chronicle, 29, 30, 31, 32, 127 n.; to Davies's Chronicle, 29, 30, 127, 128; to other English sources, 30, 31, 123; its date, 28; its value, 31; mentioned, 44, 113.
- Evan (Yevan), ap Jankyn, 364.
- Evan ap Jankyn ap Rise, 364.

Everard, Alan, sheriff of London, 294.
 Evesham Abbey, Chronicle of, 37.
 Evesham, Monk of, Vita Ricardi by, date and manuscripts of, 24, 342; its connexion with the St. Albans Chronicles, 20, 24, 25, 43; with Giles's Chronicle, 25; character and value, 24; composed as a continuation of Higden's Polychronicon, 24, 36, 342.
 Evreux, 332.
 Ewelme, Oxford, 364.
Excerpta Historica, see Bentley.
 Exeter, Richard III at, 273; letters relating to, 211, 391; mentioned, 343.
 Exeter, bishops of, see Booth, John; Lacy, Edmund; Stafford, Edmund.
 Exeter, Dukes of, see Beaufort, Thomas; Holland, Henry, and John.
 Exton, Sir Piers, 125, 138.
 Eyvon, John, 364.

F

Fabyan, Robert, Chronicler: his Chronicle properly included amongst London Chronicles, 71, 72, 261; makes no pretence of originality, 105; its scope, ended in 1485, 104; its sources, 105, 106; after 1440 follows the Main City Chronicle, 99; comparison with other versions, 100-2, 163; with the Brut, 122; the chief medium through which the London Chronicles were known to sixteenth-century historians, 106, 110; use of, by Polydore Vergil, 254, 255; by Hall, 262; by Grafton, 265; by Lanquet and Cooper, 266; by Stow, 267, 269; by Holinshed, 273; in other Town Chronicles, 111; manuscripts of, 103 n.; editions of, 81, 83, 103; the first edition said to have been burnt by Wolsey's order, 88, 177; account of Revolution of 1399 in, 87; of Lollards' Bill in, 16, 88, 105; of Henry V's riotous youth, 66; Lydgate's verses in, 83, 105; history of Richard III in, 106. 'Fabian's MS.' (so-called by Stow) not his work, 70, 83—see The Great Chronicle of London under London, Chronicles of.

 Falaise, siege of, in 1417, 132, 289; agreement for surrender of, 60, 82 n.
 Falconer or Faukoner, Thomas, mayor of London, 74, 294.
 Fampage, see Vaumpage.
 Fastolf, Sir John, has to defend his place in Southwark during Cade's rebellion, 201; his death, 199, 204; his relations with the Pastons, 199, 204, 205; his papers, 200, 203; William Worcester his secretary, 69, 162, 163; Basset writes for, 68.
 Fauconberg, Bastard of, see Neville, Thomas.
 Faversham, executions at, 372.
 Fazakerley, Richard, 368.
 Fenn, Sir John, his edition of the Paston Letters, 197, 198.
 Ferrara, English scholars at, 6; Tito Livio at, 51.
 Ferrers, Henry, prior of Folkestone, 391, 392.
 Ferrers of Chartley, Edmund, lord, at sieges of Rouen and Meaux, 318, 319.
 Ferrers of Chartley, Walter, lord, see Devereux.
 Ferrers of Groby, Edward, lord, see Grey.
 Ferriby, William, dean of York, executed, 276, 313; his discourse on the fall of Richard II, 25; mentioned, 32.
 Ferrier, St. Vincent, preaches before Henry V, 23, 67.
 Fickets Field, 324.
 Fiennes, James, Lord Say,

his unpopularity, 243, 370; indicted, 365, in the Tower, 371; murdered by Cade, 366.
 Fiennes, Richard, lord Dacre of the South, 375, 383.
 Fiennes, William, second lord Say, killed at Barnet, 374.
 Filliol, William, 389.
 Fitzalan, Thomas, Earl of Arundel, restored to his title and estates, 275, 312; commands expedition of 1411, 315; made treasurer, 284; his death, 285.
 Fitzalan, Thomas, lord Matravers, 375.
 Fitzalan, William, Earl of Arundel, 383.
 Fitzgerald, James, Earl of Desmond, 289.
 Fitzhugh, Henry, lord, at capture of Archbishop Scrope, 282; at sieges of Rouen and Meaux, 318, 319.
 Fitzwalter, Walter, lord, at siege of Meaux, 319; taken prisoner at Bauge, 295, 320.
 Flanders, Flemings: Humphrey of Gloucester's invasion of, 93, 94, 125, 322, 352; commercial relations with, 210, 234; papers relating to affairs of, 214, 220; unpopularity of Flemings in England, 125, 126, 233, 234; ballads, &c., in despite of, 234, 240, 241.
 Fleetwood, William, owned a copy of The Arrival, 174, 176, 273.
 Fleming, Abraham, his share in Holinshed's Chronicle, 271, 272.
 Fleming, Richard, bishop of Lincoln, 290.
 Flenley, Mr. R., his Six Town Chronicles, 70, 80, 81, 112.
 Flint, Henry Percy at, 281; troubles at, in 1450, 366.
 Flore or Flory, John, 378.
 Flushing, Edward IV sails from, 175.
 Foix, Jean de, Earl of Kendal, 360.

- Folkestone Priory, 391, 392.
 Fonblanque, Albany de, his Annals of the House of Percy, 213, 225.
 Forest, William, monk of Whalley, 279.
 Formigny, battle of, 138.
 Forster, John, monk of Whalley, 279.
 Fortescue, Sir John, Chief Justice, indicted in 1450, 365; taken prisoner at Tewkesbury, 378; possible author of Somnium Vigilantis, 168; his writings on the claim of the Duke of York, ib.; his De Laudibus Legum Angliæ, and Governance of England, 169; letters written by, 226; manuscript copies of his Replacation, 369, 370; owned Rawlinson MS. C. 398, 310.
 Foul Raid, The, in 1417, 23, 144.
 Fox, Richard, his account of events in 1447, 129.
 Foxe, John, the martyrologist, owned Arundel MS. 5, 310.
 Foxe, Richard, bishop of Winchester, a friend of Polydore Vergil, 192.
 France: The wars in: expeditions of 1411-12, 26, 27, 53, 123 n., 141, 146, 315; under Henry V, 17, 34, 36, 41, 42, 47-9, 53, 54, 60, 61, 89, 116-18, 123, 124, 130, 217, 277, 278, 285-90, 302-8, 316-20, 325-37; under Henry VI, 84, 89, 90, 124, 131, 263, 320, 321, 339-41. Negotiations for peace, 119, 231, 242; relations of Edward IV with, 182, 218.
 Franciscan friars, allusions to, in Continuation of Eulogium, 29 n., 30; poems against, 233; execution of, in 1401, 313.
 French Chronicles, indispensable as sources of English history in the fifteenth century, 9; value as corrective of English accounts, 43; French sources used by Polydore Vergil, 254, 255; by Hall, 262-4; by Stow, 269; by Holinshed, 273; effect on English opinion, 264. See also Gaguin; Monstrelet; Waurin.
 French Language, use of, in England dying out, 195; diminishing use in correspondence, 3, 196, 209, 211, 214; the ability to speak it an accomplishment, 195.
 Frere, William, edited fifth volume of Paston Letters, 197.
 Fresnay-le-Vicomte, 289.
 Froissart, Jean, 254.
 Fulthorp, Sir William, 314 n.
 Fyneux, John, 393.
- G
- Gaguin, Robert, his Compendium super Francorum Gestis, use of, by English writers, 105, 177, 262, 269.
 Gairdner, Dr. James, criticisms by: on Walsingham's Historia Anglicana, 14; on Gregory's Chronicle, 97, 98; on Page's Siege of Rouen, 117, 118; on a Brief Latin Chronicle to 1471, 159; on Ely Brief Notes, 161; on the History of Richard III, 185, 186. On the state of education in the fifteenth century, 194, 195; his edition of the Paston Letters, 197, 198; his Letters and Papers of the Reign of Richard III, 224. His Life of Richard III, 224, 226. Referred to, 200, 202, 203, 360. See also Collections of a London Citizen; Three Fifteenth Century Chronicles.
 Gale, Thomas, his Rerum Anglicarum Scriptores, 179; his scandal about Polydore Vergil, 257.
 Gargrave or Gergrave, John, arrested by Richard of York, 297; indicted, 365.
 Garter, Order of the, Sigismund admitted to, 287, 328; feast of, held by Edward IV, 380.—Garter King-of-Arms, see Smart, John.
 Gascoigne, Thomas, his narrative of Archbishop Scrope's execution, 38, 167; historical information in his Theological Dictionary, 166; gives story of Hotspur and Henry IV, 122.
 Gascoigne, Sir William, Chief Justice: Mayor of London called before, 107; story of his relation with Henry V, ib., 263; refuses to try Archbishop Scrope, 314 n.
 Gasquet, Right Rev. Abbot, on Polydore Vergil, 256.
 Gate, Sir Geoffrey or Jeffray, 384, 385.
 Geddington, Northants, 141.
 Genoa, Genoese fleet defeated by Bedford, 287, 300, 328, 329; by Huntingdon, 307, 331.
 George, Duke of Clarence, his alliance with Warwick in 1469-70, 173, 174, 213; Humphrey Stafford, Earl of Devonshire, accused of plotting his death, 357; his movements in 1470-1, 392, 393; Edward, Prince of Wales, appeals to, 172; with Edward IV in London, 375; commended in Parliament, 382; scene at his trial, 182; allegation that he was elder brother of Edward IV, 177; letters written by, 225, 370, 392, 393; mentioned, 162, 237 n.
 George, Duke of Bedford, son of Edward IV, 125.
 Gergrave, see Gargrave.
Gesta Henrici Quinti, doubts as to its authorship, 45; correctly attributed to Elmham, 45, 46; connexion with Liber

- Metrius*, 46; character and value, 47-9; apparently known to Hardyng, 49, 146; editions and manuscripts, 45, 49.
- Ghent, Henry Beaufort at, 217; news from, in 1436, 390; copy of The Arrival at, 176.
- Giles, John Allen, his faulty editing, 24, 25, 45, 49, 155, 156, 158; his Révolte du Conte de Warwick, 176.
- Giles's Chronicle* (Incerti Scriptoris Chronicon . . . de regnis Henrici IV, Henrici V, Henrici VI), manuscripts, 24, 49, 155-7, 338: Chronicle of Henry IV, sources and character, 24, 25; Tyler's criticism of, 26, 27; London origin of, 26, 44: Chronicle of Henry V = Gesta, 45, 49, 63: Chronicle of Henry VI, its character and value, 156-8; traces of London original, 79, 91, 113, 157; the Brief Notes for 1440-3 come from same source, 156, 338.
- Gilson, Mr. J. P., on Somnium Vigilantis, 167-8.
- Gisors, siege of, 54, 319, 334.
- Glastonbury Abbey, Lansdowne MS. 212 formerly belonged to, 310.
- Glendower, Owen, his quarrel with lord Grey de Ruthyn, 280, 313; his rebellion, 24, 38, 212, 276, 280; Edmund Mortimer marries his daughter, 280; the Tripartite Convention, 26; dread of, in England, 21, 280; styled 'venerabilis et decens armiger', 27; relations of, with Adam Usk, 33, 34; prophecy applied to, 236.
- Gloucester, troubles at, in 1450, 162, 355; in 1463, 356, 357; Edward IV at, 354; mentioned, 343.
- Gloucester Abbey, deprecations at, 355; abbot of, see Bowlers, Reginald.
- Gloucester Annals*, 161, 162, 354-7.
- Gloucester, Dukes of, see Humphrey; Richard III; Duchesses of, see Cobham, Eleanor; Jacqueline. — Thomas, Earl of, see Despensers, Thomas.
- Gloucestershire, troubles in, 356.
- Glover, Robert, owned a Tewkesbury Chronicle, 376.
- Godard, Sir Henry, 320 n.
- Godstow Chronicle*, 37 n., 311.
- Gogh, —, asquire, beheaded at Tewkesbury, 378.
- Goldstone, Reginald, letter written by, 393.
- Goodwin, Thomas, his History of the Reign of Henry V, 55.
- Gorges, Sir Walter, 338.
- Gough, Sir Matthew, 366.
- Gouteley, —, killed at Shrewsbury, 350.
- Gower, John, his poems, 228, 229; quoted by Stow, 269.
- Gower, John, beheaded at Tewkesbury, 378.
- Graeme, William, murders James I of Scotland, 323.
- Grafton, Richard, his edition of Hardyng's Chronicle, 146, 148; his prose continuation for the reigns of Edward IV and Richard III, 186-8, 259, 263, 270; his edition of Hall's Chronicle, 265; his own Chronicle of England, ib.; his dispute with Stow, 148.
- Graunt Jaques, 318.
- Gravelines (Greuenyng), 384.
- Gravesend, 385.
- Graville, Sire de, his wager with Sir John Cornwall, 42.
- Gray, see Grey.
- Greenwich, 296, 372.
- Gregory, William, mayor of London, probably not the author of Gregory's Chronicle, 96, 97.
- Gregory's Chronicle*, the question of its authorship, 96, 97; personality of the author, 98, 108; the early part to 1431, 75, 76, 86; represents Version of 1440, 74, 78, 79, 90, 91; literary quality and historical value of the conclusion, 96, 98, 110; errors of chronology in, 73, 74, 96; date of writing, 97; resemblances of: to Harley 3775, 292; to Arundel 19, 90, 296, 297; parallels to other Chronicles, 26, 136, 159, 278 n.; notice of troubles at Sherborne in, 346; criticism of, by Professor Oman, 98.
- Gresham, James, letters from, to John Paston, 200, 346, 359.
- Grey of Ruthyn, Edmund, 4th lord, afterwards Earl of Kent, 373, 375.
- Grey, Edward, lord Ferrers of Groby, 390.
- Grey of Ruthyn, George, lord, 375.
- Grey of Codnor, Henry, 7th lord, 375, 383.
- Grey, John, Earl of Tankerville, 290, 320.
- Grey of Codnor, John, 5th lord, 319.
- Grey, Sir Ralph, 322.
- Grey of Ruthyn, Reginald, 3rd lord, 276, 280, 313.
- Grey of Wilton, Reginald, lord, 383.
- Grey of Codnor, Richard, 4th lord, 287 n., 289.
- Grey of Heton, Sir Thomas, 288, 316, 325.
- Grey, William, bishop of Ely, English humanist, studies under Guarini at Ferrara, 6; patron of John Warkworth, 172; at court of Edward IV., 383.
- Greyfriars Chronicle of London*, The, 72, 106.
- Greystoke, Sir William de, 283.
- Greyve, John, letter written by, 390.
- Griffith ap David ap Thomas, 363.
- Griffith ap Nicollason, 364.
- Grimsby, 343.
- Grinhylltone, John, monk of Whalley, 279.

Grocyn, William, 6.
 Gruff of Kalcote, 390.
 Gruthus, or Gruthuyse, John, 387.
 Gruthus or Gruthuyse, Louis, Sire de, his kindness to Edward IV in exile, 382; entertains English Embassy at Bruges, 379, 380; comes to England, 384; his reception in London, 385; entertained at Windsor, 386-8; created Earl of Winchester, 383, 388; his titles, 384.
 Grymston, Edward, 365.
 Gryswold, Thomas, 365.
 Guarini, Guarino, of Ferrara, English scholars under, 6; a friend of Tito Livio, 51, 52.
 Guienne, 82, 223, 361.
 Guildford, Surrey, 364.
 Guines, 327, 384.
 Gunere, Hugh, 364.
 Gunthorpe, John, 6.

H

Hakluyt, Richard, 104 n.
 Hales or Hals, John, bishop of Lichfield or Chester, recommended for deanery of Exeter, 391; at Court of Edward IV, 383.
 Hall, Davy, councillor to Richard of York and ancestor of Edward Hall, 262, 263.
 Hall, Edward, historian, account of, 261; his prejudice, 121, 261, 263, 265, 273; his embellishments, 120, 263, 264; his sources, 55, 262; peculiar material for Henry IV, 262; his use of Basset, 68, 69, 262; of the Chronicles of London, 88, 90, 110, 263; of the Brut, 113, 118, 121, 262; of Hardyng, 148; of the History of Richard III, 185, 263; off amily tradition, 262, 263; of Monstrelet, 264; his debt to Polydore Vergil, 254, 261, 262, 264; edited and plagiarized by Grafton, 265; use of, by Stow, 267, 269, 270; by Holinshed, 272-4; value and importance of, for fifteenth-century history, 11, 253; influence of, on later opinion, 265, 274; his account of the Tripartite Convention, 26 n.; letters given by, 215.

 Hall, John, 365.
 Hallam, Henry, his criticisms of Whethamstede, 152; of the History of Richard III, 188; of Christopher Ocland, 272 n.
 Halliwell-Phillipps, J. O., his edition of Warkworth's Chronicle, 173; his Letters of the Kings of England, 214, 215.
 Hals, John, see Hales.
 Hampden, Sir Edmund, 365.
 Hampden, Sir John, 366.
 Hampton, John, 365.
 Hanley Castle, 357.
 Hanse, The, commercial relations with, 218, 220.
 Harbert, Thomas, 363.
 Harcourt, Sir Robert, 381.
 Hardyng, John, chronicler, account of, 140-2; his mission to Scotland, 141, 146; his forgeries, 142, 143; the first version of his Chronicle: its date, 143; its character, 144-6; cited, 42; presented to Henry VI, 142, 143; the second version: its date, 142, 143; its character, 146, 147; presented to Edward IV, 142, 144; his sources, 147, 148; value of his work, 140, 148; editions, 146, 148, 149, 259; manuscripts, 149 n.; patronized by Henry Beaufort, 5; his account of Henry IV's death, 39, 50; his story of Andrew Lombard, 42; his story of Henry V and the two lords, 126; acquainted with the Gesta Henrici, 49, 146; use of, by Hall, 262; by Stow, 267, 268; by Holinshed, 148; mentioned, 171, 230, 237.

Hare, Robert, owned Arundel MS. 19, 296.
 Harfleur, siege of, in 1415, 47, 61, 116, 123, 238, 239, 277, 285, 300, 316, 325, 350; fighting round, in 1416, 17, 41, 59, 328; Bedford's sea-fight off, 48, 60, 76, 141, 287, 329; Huntingdon's sea-fight off, in 1417, 288, 307; recovery of, by English in 1440, 339, 341; memorial verses on siege, 50.
 Harington, Sir James, 289.
 Harington, John, lord, 289.
 Harington, Sir John, on authorship of the History of Richard III, 185.
 Harington, William, lord, 318, 319.
 Harpsfield, Nicholas, his reference to the 'Translator of Livius', 64, 66; mentioned, 8 n.
 Harries, John, shipman of York, his treasonable conduct, 371.
 Harrison, William, his share in Holinshed's Chronicles, 271.
 Hastings, 343.
 Hastings, William, lord, his loyalty to Edward IV, 249, 382; recovers Calais, 181 n.; lord chamberlain, 382, 383, 385-7; attends Gruthus to the bath, 387; his intrigue with Jane Shore, 187; erroneously called Richard by More, 188; mentioned, 375.
 Hattecliff, or Attecliffe, William, secretary to Edward IV, 383, 388; employed on missions to Charles the Bold, 380, 381.
 Haweslowe, William, Clarenceux, 384.
 Haydon, F. R., his edition of the Eulogium Historiarum, 28.
 Hayward, see Howard.
 Haywardyn, —, a thief executed by Cade, 136 n.
 Hazlewood, Yorks., Northumberland and Bardolf defeated near, 311.
 Hearne, Thomas, antiquary, works edited by:

Otterbourne's Chronicle, 21, 23; Tito Livio's Vita Henrici, 50, 55, 56; Pseudo-Elmham's Vita et Gesta Henrici, 56, 59, 62; Blakman's De Virtutibus Henrici Sexti, 149; Whethamstede's Chronicle, 154; Worcester's Annales, 164; A Remarkable Fragment, 176; Rous's Historia Regum, 184; The Battaile of Agincourt, 238; Godstow Chronicle, 311. His error as to the Pseudo-Elmham, 46, 56, 59; his notice of Basset, 68, 69.

Hearn's Fragment, authorship and date, 176, 177; character and value, 177, 178.

Helly, Jacques, Sire de, 60. Helston, Cornwall, 343.

Henley, 342, 343.

Henry IV, King of England, his coronation, 34, 275, 279, 312; his claim to the throne, 146; in Scotland, 275, 280; his quarrel with Hotspur, 122, 126; at Shrewsbury, 281; at Pontefract, 282; at York, ib.; stricken with illness, 22, 277, 282; illness alleged to be punishment for execution of Scrope, 35, 43, 248, 264, 282; in Northumberland, 283; his relations with his son, 22, 27, 66, 84, 144; his relations with Parliament, 2; his visits to Evesham, 24; marries Joanna of Navarre, 282, 314; his children, 282, 315 n.; his death-bed, 39, 50, 66; his burial, 123, 284, 315; Maidstone's fiction about his burial, 38; his character: commended, 32, 40, 277; depreciated by Hardyng, 146. Narratives of his reign, 16, 20, 22, 24-6, 29, 34, 35, 38, 84, 87, 116, 122, 123, 144, 262, 275-7, 279-84, 312-15, 350. Letters relating to his reign, 211-12, 220, 225, 226, 389. Poems relating to, 229, 233. 'Prophecies' applied to, 236, 262.

Henry V, King of England, date of his birth, 50 n.; born at Monmouth, 316, 323; created Prince of Wales, 275, 312; serves in Wales, 211, 280; his connexion with the Lollards' Bill, 16; at Badby's execution, 230; relations with his father, 22, 27, 66, 84, 144; his father's dying advice to, 39, 50, 66; story of the Prince and the Chief Justice, 67, 69, 107, 263; his youthful wildness, and conversion after he became king, 32, 66, 120, 126, 277; his coronation, 41, 59, 284, 316, 323; suppresses Lollard rising, 284, 293, 324; at Leicester Parliament, 41, 285, 325; consults Universities on his claim in France, 323, 324; story that he was instigated by churchmen, 120; the 'tennis-ball' story, 23, 41, 179, 215, 239, 350; his devotion at Agincourt, 179; his visit to the battle-field, 225, 389; visits Holywell, 34; his entertainment of Sigismund, 300, 328-30; St. Vincent Ferrier preaches before, 23, 67; his meeting with Catherine, 333, 334; his fight with Barbasan, 67; at Kenilworth 42, 49; his Yorkshire progress, 36, 42, 290; his death, 61, 68, 120, 134, 290, 295, 320, 337; his tomb, 120; his character, 117, 120, 143, 145, 229, 248; his fame in Italy, 51; will not have poems sung in his honour, 240; evolution of the traditional view of his character, 55, 68, 135; Ormonde's stories of, 65-7; his speeches, 55, 60; his letters, 211, 214, 217, 218; wrote in English, 217; his policy, 1; his sea-keeping, 234; his relations with Parliament,

2; his religious foundations, 57, 66, 323; his patronage of learning, 4; connexion with Oxford, 4, 184; Walsingham writes Ypodigma for, 15, 18; Hoccleve writes for, 230, 231; Lydgate dedicates Troy Book to, 231; Elmham in his service, 46; employs Hardyng, 141. Narratives of his reign, 17, 18, 22, 23, 32, 34, 36, 41, 42, 47-9, 53-5, 58-61, 84, 89, 116, 123, 124, 126, 132, 144, 277, 278, 284-90, 293-5, 299-309, 316-20, 323-37, 342. Letters relating to his reign, 211, 212, 215-18, 220, 223, 389. Poems relating to, 117, 229, 233, 238-40.

Henry VI, King of England, his birth, 278, 290, 295; his accession, 278, 320; refuses to travel on Sunday, 84; John Somerset, his tutor, 57; crowned at Westminster, 290, 320, 351; crowned at Paris, 291, 320, 351; reception at Paris, 92; reception in London, 87, 92; and Eleanor Cobham, 93, 340; proposed Armagnac marriage, 121, 221; marries Margaret of Anjou, 121, 344, 353; at time of Cade's rebellion, 371; journey into Kent, 372; at Dartford in 1452, 297, 298; his illness, 202; his death, 165 n., 172, 175, 180, 181, 191, 370, 375; buried at Chertsey, 165 n., 370, 375; miracles, 181, 185; translated to Windsor, 181; prayers and hymns in his honour, 211, 229; his character: contemporary criticisms, 122, 142, 143, 147, 149, 152, 248; Tudor criticism, 255; Lives of, 149; his educational foundations, 5, 195, 222; disorders of his later years, 143, 145, 180; causes of his downfall, 2, 169, 232; his poverty, 243, 360. Narratives of his reign

- 84-6, 88-99, 121, 144, 145, 150-2, 156-64, 278, 290, 291, 320-3, 339-41, 343-5, 347-9, 351-6, 370-3. Letters relating to his reign, 200-4, 213, 215-24, 390, 391. Poems and verses relating to his reign, 231-5, 240-7, 359, 370, 395-7.
- Henry VII, King of England, his early history, 191, 192; lands at Milford, 394; takes the bailliff of Shrewsbury into favour, 250; at Bosworth, 219, 263; ballads on, 249-52; marries Elizabeth of York, 99; restores Peter Curteys to his office of Keeper of the Wardrobe, 182 n.; his expedition to Boulogne, 184 n.; history of his reign in The Great Chronicle of London, 101; Polydore Vergil writes his History at his request, 192; his personal appearance, 251.
- Henry VIII, King of England, the 'Translator of Livius' writes for his instruction, 65, 68; Polydore Vergil dedicates his History to, 256; Hall supports his policy, 261.
- Herbert, William I, lord Herbert and Earl of Pembroke, defeated at Edgcote, 356; executed, 357.
- Herbert, William II, Earl of Pembroke, supports Edward IV, 375; at Garter feast, 381.
- Hereford, 343.
- Hereford, bishop of, see Bowlers, Reginald.
- Hereford, Countess of, see Bohun, Joan.
- Herlis, John, squire to Edward IV, 385.
- Hervy, Nicholas, Recorder of Bristol, 378.
- Hexham, 159.
- Heydon, John, opponent of John Paston, 200, 201.
- Heyward, John, Prior of Lanthony, 355, 357.
- Hickling Priory, Norfolk, annals of, 37.
- Higden, Ranulph, his Polychronicon: Trevisa's translation of, 8, 136; fifteenth-century continuations of, 24, 32, 35, 36, 279, 342; Caxton's continuation of, 137.
- Hingeston, afterwards Hingeston-Randolph, F. C., his edition of Capgrave's historical works, 39; his Royal and Historical Letters, 220.
- Hoccleve, Thomas, his Regement of Princes, 230; political references in minor poems, 231; patronized by Henry V, 4, 230; cited by Stow, 269; mentioned, 228, 229.
- Hogue, La (Hogges), in Normandy, 305.
- Holinshed, Raphael, historian, his Chronicles: the work of a syndicate, 271; a meritorious compilation, 274; free use made of Hall and Stow, 272; independent use of Walsingham, 18; of Tito Livio's Vita, 55, 272; of 'Translator of Livius', 64-6, 272; of Pseudo-Elmham, 62, 272; of London Chronicles, 87, 110; of the Brut, 113, 118; of Hardyng, 148; of Whethamstede, 154, 273; of The Arrivall, 176; of the History of Richard III, 273; of Monstrelet and other French writers, 264, 272, 273; of other material, 272, 273; follows Hall's prejudices, 120, 264, 265, 274; influence on Shakespeare, 120, 121-2, 264, 273-4; importance for fifteenth-century history, 11, 68, 253, 261; Stow's complaint of, 268.
- Holland, Edmund, Earl of Kent, marries Lucia Visconti, 315; killed at St. Brienc in Brittany, 22, 30 n., 315.
- Holland, Henry, 2nd Duke of Exeter, named as a fit councillor by the commons of Kent, 361; supports Henry VI in 1450, 371, 372; and in 1452, 373; at Barnet, 374; his Duchess (Anne, daughter of Richard of York), 387.
- Holland, John I, Earl of Huntingdon, previously Duke of Exeter, joins conspiracy against Henry IV, 279, 312; beheaded at Plasshy, 276, 313.
- Holland, John II, Earl of Huntingdon, afterwards Duke of Exeter, at relief of Harfleur in 1416, 287; commands in sea-fight in 1417, 288, 301, 307, 331; at sieges of Rouen and Melun, 318, 319; taken prisoner at Baugé, 290, 295, 320; burns Popeering in 1436, 322 n.; created Duke of Exeter, 353; his death, 243, 354; a letter to, 391.
- Holland, Margaret, Duchess of Clarence, at Melun, 319; her death and burial, 339, 340.
- Holland, Thomas, Earl of Kent, previously Duke of Surrey, joins conspiracy against Henry IV, 279, 312; killed at Cirencester, 276, 313.
- Holland, William of Bavaria, Duke of, visits England, 300, 330.
- Hollingworth, Kent, 372.
- Holme, Thomas, Norroy, 384.
- Holywell, Flint, 34.
- Homildon Hill, battle of, 29, 141, 238, 280.
- Hoo, Sir Thomas, 359, 365.
- Hooker, John, his share in Holinshed's Chronicle, 271, 273.
- Horkesley, —, a letter to, 216.
- Hom, Andrew, possible author of Annales Londonienses, 71.
- Horsham, 343.
- Hounslow, Trinitarian Friary at, 38.
- Howard (Heyward), John, first Duke of Norfolk, kinsman of John Mowbray VI, knight of the shire for Norfolk, 205; a complaint against him,

- 116; supports Edward IV, 375; K. G., 380; his services to Richard III, 187.
- Howard, Thomas, second Duke of Norfolk, his services to Richard III, 187; Treasurer of England, 177.
- Howard, Thomas, third Duke of Norfolk, marries the Lady Anne, 187.
- Howard, Lord William, of Naworth, manuscripts owned by, 62, 296, 310, 374.
- Howes, Edmond, his editions of Stow's Summary, 72; of Stow's Annales, 268.
- Hugford, Thomas, sheriff of Worcestershire, 366 n.
- Hugo ap Thomas, two persons of the name, 364.
- Hull, 343.
- Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, created duke, 285, 293, 325; captures Bayeux, 306; his campaign in the Cotentin, 54, 64; at sieges of Rouen and Melun, 318, 319; returns to England in Dec. 1419, 54; guardian of Henry VI, 278; his quarrel with Cardinal Beaufort in 1425-6, 82, 86, 88, 106, 263; complaint of women of the Stocks Market against, 151; his expedition into Flanders in 1436, 125, 321, 322, 352; his Articles against Beaufort in 1440, 106, 221, 263; his attitude to the proceedings against Eleanor Cobham, 93; Hall's version, 265; his arrest and death at Bury, 129, 147, 244, 344, 347, 353; the story in the Mutability of Worldly Changes, 395, 397; buried at St. Albans, 347; Suffolk accused of plotting his death, 243, 244, 361; his memory cleared in Parliament of 1455, 151; adopted by Yorkist writers as the 'Good Duke', 122, 243, 244, 248; this view developed by Tudor historians, 255, 264, 265; lukewarm reference to, by Hardyng, 147; list of his servants, 363, 364; his revenues from Bordeaux, 360; his alms-dish, 372; his visits to St. Albans Abbey, 150. His patronage of learning; his books, 4; his correspondence with Italian scholars, ib.; Tito Livio enters his service, 51; employs Livio to write the Vita Henrici, 5, 51; and supplies him with material, 53-5; possibility that the Pseudo-Elmham was a foreign scholar in his service, 59; prominence of Humphrey in works of Livio and Pseudo-Elmham, 54, 58, 64; a friend of Abbot Whethamstede, 152; Bekynton, his secretary, 221; John Somerset, his executor, 58; Lydgate writes his Falls of Princes for, 231; his munificence to the University Library at Oxford, 4, 58, 158; his undying fame therefor, 344.
- Hunden, Richard, Lollard, 150.
- Hungerford, Edmund, 365.
- Hungerford, Sir Nicholas, killed at Shrewsbury, 350.
- Hungerford, Robert, lord, also Lord Molynes, iure uxoris, letter written by, 226; suppresses rising in Wiltshire, 346; his interests in Norfolk, 200; supports Henry VI, 373.
- Hungerford, Walter, lord, at Agincourt, 55; at siege of Melun, 319; his death, 58; Pseudo-Elmham originally dedicated Vita et Gesta to, 5, 58, 59; and perhaps obtained material from, 61; a letter written by, 390.
- Huntingdon, 343.
- Huntingdon, Earls of, see Holland.
- Hythe, 343.
- I
- Iden, or Yden, Alexander, 297.
- Inglose, Sir Henry, 320.
- Ingulph, spurious chronicle attributed to, 179.
- Ipswich, 343, 344.
- Ireland, Richard of York in, 145, 247, 296, 371; importance of, recognized in Libel of English Policy, 234.
- Isabella, Queen of Richard II, 27, 313.
- Isabella, Queen of France, at Conference of Meulan, 332, 333; supports Treaty of Troyes, 278, 335, 336; at siege of Melun, 319, 336.
- Isle, or Ysele, William, 362.
- Isleworth, 38.
- Italian influence: on English Renaissance, 4, 6; on English historical literature, through Tito Livio and Polydore Vergil, 8, 51, 52, 254, 260.
- J
- Jack Upland*, 233.
- Jacqueline of Hainault, Duchess of Gloucester, 150.
- James I, King of Scotland, at siege of Melun, 319; besieges Roxburgh, 322; murdered, 323; alleged offer to bribe Hardyng, 141; mentioned, 128, 130, 144.
- James III, King of Scotland, 369.
- Jankyn Thaylde, 363.
- Jenney, E., letter from, 393 n.
- Jerningham, John, 204.
- Joan of Arc, the only reference to, in English contemporary chronicles, 84, 118; fiction of an English legend hostile to her, 264.
- Joanna of Navarre, Queen of Henry IV, her marriage and abortive children, 282, 314; and Friar Randolph, 118; buried at Canterbury, 123 n.
- John, XXIII, Pope, 27.
- John, Duke of Bedford, present at capture of Archbishop Scrope, 282; made Constable, 283; receives lands of Earl of Northumberland, 284; at 'hurling in Eastcheap', 107; created duke by Henry V, 285, 293, 325; relieves Harfleur, 48, 53, 287, 329; Warden of England, 302; at execution of Oldcastle, 41; at siege of Melun, 319; Regent of France, 278, 295; his victory at Verneuil, 320; letter of Cardinal Beaufort to, 82, 86, 88; his agreement with Humphrey of Gloucester, 222; in Normandy, 291; mentioned, 1, 164.

 John of Bridlington, prophecies attributed to, 236.
 John, Sir Hugh, 226.
 John ap Rics, 364.
 Jordane, or Jurdeymayne, Margery, the witch of Eye, 340, 341.
 Joseph of Arimathea, St., 310.

K

Kail, Dr. J., his edition of Twenty-six Political and other Poems, 233.
 Keble, Henry, mayor of London, 101.
 Kedecaws, see Chef de Caux.
 Kemp, John, Cardinal, successively archbishop of York and of Canterbury, opposes Scots at Roxburgh, 322; comes to London during Cade's rebellion, 371; holds inquisition in Kent, 359, 364; deprives Hardyng of Geddington, 142, 143; letters written by, 224.
 Kendal, Earl of, see Foix, Jean de.
 Kenilworth (Kyllyngworth), Henry V at, 23, 42, 49; Henry VI at, 372, 391; John Strecche on events at, 40; mentioned, 368.
 Kent, Cade's rising in, 244, 344, 347, 371, 372; Petition of Commons of, 165, 358, 360-2, 390; Henry VI in, 372; executions in, 348; Richard of York in, 373; Earl of Shrewsbury suppresses disturbance in, 368; supports Yorkists in 1460, 245, 246; excitement in, in 1469, 356; Articles of Commons, in 1470, 369; supports Fauconberg, 374, 375; Edward IV in, 375; a church burnt in, 353.

 Kent, Earls of, see Grey, Edmund; Holland, Edmund, and Thomas.
 Kent, Thomas, Clerk of the Council to Henry VI, 220 n., 364, 365.
 Kighley, Sir John, 301.
 Kilmainham, Prior of, see Butler, Thomas.
 King's Lynn, Chronicle of, 111; mentioned ('Len Episcopi'), 343.
 Kingston-on-Thames, 297, 353.
 Kingston, Richard, a letter written by, 212.
 Kirkstall Chronicle, 35, 279.
 Knolles, Sir Robert, 26, 315.
 Kyghley, Sir Richard, 286.
 Kyme, John Hardyng, Constable of, 141.
 Kyme, Earl of, see Umfraville, Gilbert.

L

Lacy, Edmund, bishop of Exeter, his dispute with the city, 211; a letter written by, 391.
 Lancaster, House of, constitutional government under, 2; its title defended by Fortescue, 169; causes of its downfall, 2, 169, 232, 255; a defence of its policy, 168.
 Lang, Mr. Andrew, on Joan of Arc, 264.
 Langley, Thomas, bishop of Durham, opposes Scots at Roxburgh, 322; letters written by, 216, 224.
 Langstrother, Sir John, Prior of St. John's, 374, 377.
 Langton, John, bishop of St. Davids, 157.

Lanquet, Thomas, his Chronicle, 266.
 Lanthony Priory, 162, 355, 357.
 Latin Brut, The, its character, 129-31; chiefly of textual or literary interest, 131; illustrates composition of English original, 131-2; its resemblance to Davies's Chronicle, 127, 128; use of it by Tito Livio, 53, 54, 60, 131; by Hardyng, 144, 147, 148; continuations of, 154, 155, 158-60; two versions of, 130, 310; peculiar copies of, 311, 342; manuscripts of, 310-12; text of, 312-37; sometimes attributed to Richard Rede, 311.
 Latin language, diminishing use of, 3, 195; displacement of, as literary medium, 69, 110, 169, 170; retains favour with ecclesiastics, 154, 219, 222; but Latin writers use English originals, 44, 155, 170; and write bad Latin, 155, 170, 376; early Latin letters, 209, 212, 223; diminished use in official documents, 214, 222; different character of later Latin Chronicles, 170, 171; use of Latin by Polydore Vergil does not influence his successors, 8, 259.
 Launde, Prior of (Walter Baldock), executed, 130, 233, 313.
 Lear, King, 41.
 Leche, Sir Philip, 318.
 Leeds, Kent, 364.
 Leicester, Parliament at, in 1414, 54, 120, 121, 264, 285, 293, 325; hall erected for the Parliament, 41; Parliament at, in 1450, 347, 371; Parliament proposed to be held at, 1455, 345; Edward IV at, 142; Richard III's dead body brought to, 252; Peter Curteys feodary of, 182 n.; a dispute at, 390; mentioned, 343.
 eland, John, his Collec-

- tions, 173, 270; his censure of Polydore Vergil, 257.
- Le Neve, Peter, acquires the Paston papers, 197.
- Lenton Priory, Northants, 45, 46.
- Lenz, Dr. Max, first identifies Elmham as author of Gesta, 45.
- Leominster, 343.
- Lewes, 343.
- Lewknor, Sir John, 377.
- Libel of English Policy*, The, its character and value, 234, 235; evidence of its date, 241 n.; parallels to, 165, 235, 236, 359.
- Lichfield, friars executed at, 29 n.; George, Duke of Clarence, at, 392.
- Lichfield, bishops of, see Boothe, William; Hales, John.
- Lichfield, William, parson of All Hallows the More, London, a great preacher, 296.
- Linacre, Thomas, 6.
- Lincoln, Henry V at, 290; mentioned, 209, 343, 371.
- Lincoln, bishops of, see Alnwick, William; Fleming, Richard; Repingdon, Philip; Rotherham, Thomas; Russell, John.
- Lincolnshire, Chronicle of the Rebellion in*, 173, 174.
- Lindsay, Alexander, 321.
- Lingard, John, his use of The Arrival, 176; on Suffolk's letter to his son, 201.
- Liskeard, 343.
- Lisle, Viscount, see Talbot, John.
- Littleington, John, Abbot of Croyland, 180.
- Livio da Forlì, Tito, account of, 51, 52; in service of Humphrey of Gloucester, 4, 51; who employs him to write the Vita Henrici Quinti, 5, 51; and supplies him with information, 53-5; character and quality of Vita, 53, 55; its sources, 53, 54, 118; its indebtedness to Latin Brut, 53, 54, 60, 125, 131, 311, 312, 323-37 (foot-notes); its relation to the Pseudo-Elmham, 56, 57, 59-61, 63, 240; use of by sixteenth-century historians, 254, 262, 271, 272; its importance and influence, 55, 62, 64, 68 (see further 'Translator of Livius'); Hearne's edition of, 50, 55; the manuscripts, 52, 55, 56. Tito Livio's Encomium, 51; his Liber de Orthographia, 52; his acquaintance with Guarini, 51, 52; his friendship with Decembri, 52; his contribution to the English Renaissance, 8, 52, 69, 260.
- Lloyd, David, letter written by, 391.
- Llwyd, Humphrey, on Polydore Vergil, 258.
- Lollardy: the Lollards' Bill of 1410, 16, 82, 83, 87, 88, 105; Lollard rising in 1414, 35, 36, 234, 284, 285, 293, 316, 324, 325; implication of Lollards in Scrope's plot, 17; Lollard movement in 1417, 50; executions of Lollards, 16, 276, 293, 294, 318; a letter on suppression of, 389; anti-Lollardism of contemporary writers, 18, 43.
- Lombard, Andrew, his double treason, 42.
- Lomnour, William, his correspondence with John Paston, 200, 201.
- LONDON:
- Events in: 1400, Henry IV comes to, 276, 313; executions at, 276; 1410, the 'hurling in Eastcheap', 67, 107; 1414, the Lollard rising, 284, 293, 324; 1415, the news of Agincourt, 75; the pageant, 34, 47, 238, 239, 286; 1416, reception of Sigismund at, 278, 287, 299, 327, 328; 1417, Henry V takes leave of the city, 303; 1419, rejoicings after fall of London (continued)
- Rouen, 34; 1421, reception of Henry V and Catherine, 289; rejoicings at birth of Henry VI, 169 n.; 1432, pageant for Henry VI, 77, 85, 87, 88, 92, 232; 1441, Henry VI at, 93; arrest and penance of Eleanor Cobham, 156, 340, 341, 396; 1445, reception of Margaret of Anjou, 94; 1450, Henry VI comes to, 371; Jack Cade in, 347, 366, 371; Richard of York at, 372; 1454, events in, 202; 1455, Henry VI brought back to, 345; 1456, events in, 203; 1457-60, riots in, 103; 1458, the reconciliation at, 245; 1460, Yorkist lords at, 246, 247, 1461, reception of Edward IV, 102, 159, 204; 1470, Edward IV leaves, 173; the Lancastrian Restoration, 218; 1471, Fauconberg's attack on the City, 175, 248, 374, 375; triumph of Edward IV at, 375; 1472, reception of the Sire de Gruthus, 385; 1478, events in, 393.
- Influence of London, as the centre of national life, on historical literature, 260, 261; Chronicles &c. of London origin, 26, 32, 150, 159, 162, 163, 166, 235, 236, 242, 245, 246, 248, 360 (see also London, Chronicles of).
- Educational interest in, 6, 196.
- Commercial interests in, 209, 210, 235.
- Letters in the Guildhall archives, 217, 218.
- Political feeling in, 88, 109, 204, 245-7.
- The Marching-Watch, 156.
- Returns four members to Parliament, 343.
- Places in or near:
- Churches, &c.: All-hallows-the-More, 296; Blackfriars, 157; St. Dunstan in the East, 26, 82; St. John's Priory, 374;

- London (continued)
 383; St. Katharine's by the Tower, 354; St. Mary Arches, or Bow Church, 392, Whitefriars, 315.
 St. Paul's, Henry V at, in 1417, 303; new weathercock set up, 295; the steeple burnt, 94, 353; procession at, in 1458, 245; bills, &c., set up on the doors of, 249, 370; historical tablet in, 75.
 Streets and public places: Aldgate, 375; Cheap, 341, 366; Clerkenwell, 122, 164; Cornhill, 295; Crane in Vintry, 385; Crown Seld, 156; Eastcheap, 75, 107; Fink's Lane, 295; Finsbury, 294; Guildhall, 215, 217; Holborn, 296; King's Bench, 297, 364; King's Head, 156, 341; Lyon Key, 385; Milk Street, 188; Newgate, 107, 293; Redcross Street, 187, 188; St. Giles's fields, 293, 309; St. John's Street, 293; St. Katherine's, 295; St. Martin's (the sanctuary), 366; Shelleys, 385; Smithfield, 92, 294, 340; Sports Key, 294; Standard in Cheap, 366; Stocks Market, 75, 151; Thames Street, 296; Trillemell Street, 294; Tower Wharf, 296. See also London Bridge; Tower of London.
 London, bishops of, see Clifford, Richard; Kemp, John; Walden, Roger.
 London Bridge, arches of, fall down, 352; fight with Fauconberg on, 375; heads of traitors on, 294, 296, 368, 372, 375; a Glover of, 293.
 London, Chronicles of, early history of, 71, 75; Latin instances, 71, 102; French, 71; English Chronicles take shape, 3, 27, 75; their development, 75, 76, 78; later history of, 72, 106; their system of chronology, 73; their sources, 107-109; their practical utility, 73, 109; their historical quality and importance, 70, 74, 109, 110, 260, 261.
 Classification of, with lists of manuscripts and editions, 80, 81; Version of 1430, 76, 77, 82-6; Version of 1431, 77, 86, 87; Version of 1432, 77, 87-9; Version of 1440, 78, 90, 91; Version of 1445, 79, 91-4; Version of 1446, 79, 94; Continuations of S, 79, 94, 95; Miscellaneous Continuations from 1440, 79, 95-9; The Main City Chronicle, 79, 99-103.
 Individual copies: The Great Chronicle of London, 82, 83, 88, 99-101, 107, 184 n.; Harley 3775, 83, 84, 292-5; Julius B ii, 87-8; Cleopatra C iv, 54, 88-90, 239, 240, 263; in Dr. Brie's edition of the Brut, 85, 86, 91-4; Harley 540, 91-4, 295, 296; Arundel 19, 90, 95, 296-8; Vitellius A xvi, 99-102; Rawlinson B 355, 102, 112; Gough, 103. See also Bale, Robert; Gregory's Chronicle; Nicolas, Sir Harris.
 Their relation to other Chronicles: to the Brut, 10, 78, 113, 115, 116, 118, 120, 121, 123-5, 128, 133-5, 300, 311; to Giles's Chronicle, 25, 26, 157; to St. Albans Annals, 150, 151; to Ely Brief Notes, 161; to Worcester's Annales, 163; to Waltham Annals, 351; to Fabyan's Chronicle, 71, 72, 99-105. Use of, by Hall, 262. Use of, by Stow, 269; his copies and transcripts, 106, 369; his 'Register of Mayors', 107.
 Lorraine, 119.
 Lostwithiel, Cornwall, 343.
 Louis XI, King of France, 174, 184 n.
 Louis the Dauphin, sends tennis-balls to Henry V, 23, 41, 215, 239, 350; error as to his presence at Agincourt, 32, 277.
 Louth Park Abbey, Chronicle of, 37.
 Louviers, 41, 289.
 Lovell, Francis, Viscount, writes to Sir William Stonor, 209; couplet on, 249.
 Lovell, William, lord, 319.
 'Loveris', 301, 304.
 Lucerne, Adam Usk at, 33.
 Ludgershall, Wilts., 343.
 Ludlow, Salop, 180, 297, 368, 369.
 Lumley, Sir Ralph, 22, 279.
 Lydgate, John, his poetry, 229, 231; his verses for Henry VI, 77, 84, 87, 88, 92, 105, 232; minor historical poems, 229, 230; a ballad attributed to, by Dr. MacCracken, 241; the Battle of Agincourt incorrectly attributed to, 232, 238; London Lickpenny doubtful, 232; his patrons, 4, 5, 231.
 Lyhart, Walter, bishop of Norwich, 359, 365.
 Lyne (Lyne), 343.
 Lyneham, Lewes, letter written by, 226.
 Lynn (Len), 343.
 Lyrmouth, Sir William, 378.
 Lytton, Lord, incident in his Last of the Barons, 191.
- M
- MacCracken, Dr. H., on Lydgate's poems, 232, 241 n.; on poems by the Duke of Suffolk, 5 n.
 Mackerell, Doctor, 378.
 Madden, Sir Francis, his edition of Page's Siege of Rouen, 117; of the Record of Blumantle, 379.
 Magdalen de Valois, proposed match with Edward IV, 391.
 Maidstone, 297, 371.
 Maidstone, Clement, his Historia Martirii R. Scrope, 38, 167.

- Maine, cession of, 164, 221, 361.
 Maisoncelles, 318 n.
 Maldon, Essex, 'le wode Monday' at, 352; mentioned, 343.
 Malmesbury, 343; the abbey, 28, 390.
 Malvern, John, his conversation with Archbishop Scrope, 26.
 Man, Isle of, 90.
 Mandeville, John, of Burnham Thorpe, 114.
 Manfield, Robert, 365.
 Mantes, 319, 333, 334.
 March, Earls of, see Edward IV; Mortimer, Edmund.
 Marche, King of Arms, 384.
 Mare, Thomas de la, abbot of St. Albans, 12.
 Margaret of Anjou, Queen of Henry VI, her betrothal, 93; safe-conduct for, 218; lands in England, 347; her marriage, 344, 353; adverse criticism on the marriage, 121; her reception in London, 94; her early years in England, 223; her plans in 1454, 202; the Earl of Salisbury appeals to her in March 1455, 213; her energy in 1456, 203; takes part in the reconciliation of 1458, 245; her adventures in 1460, 98; flees into Scotland and thence to France and Lorraine, 119; her exile, 97, 119, 226; her agreement with Warwick, 174; taken prisoner at Tewkesbury, 374, 378; brought in triumph to London, 375; George Ashby in her service, 232; William Boothe her chancellor, 242; hostile criticism by her contemporaries, 122, 129, 166; by Polydore Vergil, 255; bitter prejudice of Hall, 265; Hall's view adopted by Holinshed and Shakespeare, ib. 273 n.; slander on her son's legitimacy, 246; her letters, &c., 222-3, 226, 369, 390, 391; not to be condemned on their evidence, 223.
Margaret of Anjou, Letters of, 222, 223.
 Margaret of York, Duchess of Burgundy, her marriage to Charles the Bold, 179, 369; entertains English embassy at Bruges, 380.
 Mark, battle of, 29 n., 30, 123.
 Markham, Sir Clements, his criticism of the Croyland Chronicle, 180, 181; argues against More's share in the History of Richard III, 186; his exaggerated censure of Morton, 190 n.
 Marlborough, 343.
 Marny, Sir Thomas, 320 n.
 Marshal, Earls, see Mowbray.
 Martin V, Pope, 77 n., 308.
 Martin, Richard, archdeacon of London, 380.
 Martin, Tom, his ownership of the Paston papers, 197.
 Mary of Gueldres, Queen of Scotland, her proposed marriage with Edward IV, 177.
 Matervase, Jean, 318.
 Matravers, lord, see Fitzalan, Thomas.
 Mawdelyn, John, 313.
 Meaux Abbey, Yorks., Chronicle of, 37.
 Meaux, in Brie, siege of, by Henry V, 54, 61, 63, 82 n., 290, 295, 337.
 Melcombe, Dorset, 343.
 Mellesburgh, Somerset, 390.
 Melun, siege of, by Henry V, 42, 54, 61, 63, 67, 289, 319, 336.
 Merlin, prophecies of, 236, 237.
 Meulan, Conference of, 212, 332.
 Michell, John, sheriff of London in 1413-14, 292.
 Michell, John, sheriff of London in 1414-15, 294.
 Middelton, Richard, 364.
 Midhurst, Sussex, 343.
 Milan, Tito Livio at, 51, 52; letter to Duke of, 393.
 Milborne, Richard, 364.
 Miles, Lewis, 378.
 Milford Haven, Henry Tudor lands at, 251, 394.
 Milverton, John, 97.
 Miners, William, 365.
 Mitton, Thomas, bailiff of Shrewsbury, 250.
 Moleyns, Adam, bishop of Chichester, his learning commended by Aeneas Sylvius, 5; articles of Richard of York against, 369; his murder, 296, 344, 366.
 Molinier, M. Anguste, on the blind following of Monstrelet, 264.
 Molyne, lord, see Hungerford, Robert.
 Monmouth, Henry V born at, 60, 316, 323.
 Monstrelet, Eugennard de, possible use of, by the Pseudo-Elmhame, 60, 61; use of, by Waurin, 136; by the 'Translator of Livius', 64, 68; by Polydore Vergil, 254, 255; by Hall, 262, 264; by Stow, 68, 271; by Holinshed, 272; disastrous effect of the blind following of, 264; cited, 42, 92, 124 n.
 Montacute, John, Earl of Salisbury, joins conspiracy against Henry IV, 279, 312; killed at Cirencester, 276, 313.
 Montacute, Thomas, Earl of Salisbury, serves in relief of Harfleur, 287; at sieges of Rouen and Melun, 318, 319; at battle of Verneuil, 320; letters written by, 213, 217; patron of Lydgate, 5.
 Montagu, Marquis of, see Neville, John.
 Montreaux, John of Burgundy killed at, 308, 334; siege of, by Henry V, 54.
 Monypenny, Sir William, 360, 367, 391.
 More, Sir John, may have supplied information to his son, 188, 189.
 More, Sir Thomas, division of opinion as to his authorship of the History

- of Richard III, 185, 186; reasons in his favour, 188, 189, 190; his commendation of Morton, 189; a friend of Polydore Vergil, 291; the History used under his name by sixteenth-century historians, 262, 263, 270, 273.
- Morgan, —, a servant of Humphrey of Gloucester, 364.
- Morley, Thomas, lord, 319.
- Mortain, Earl of, see Beaufort, Edmund I.
- Mortimer, Sir Edmund, songs in his honour, 238; captured by Glendower and marries his daughter, 277, 280.
- Mortimer, Edmund, Earl of March, his abduction, 29 n; reveals Scrope's plot, 288; serves at relief of Harfleur, 287; commands at sea, 303, 305; lands in Normandy, 305, 306; at sieges of Rouen and Melun, 318, 319.
- Mortimer, Sir John, his treason and execution, 86, 150, 296.
- Mortimer's Cross, battle of, 248.
- Morton, John, Cardinal and archbishop of Canterbury, his connexion with Oxford, 6; his exile, 97; theory that he wrote the Latin History of Richard III, 185, 186; certainly inspired it, 186, 189; praise of, by More, 189; by another contemporary, 190; exaggerated censure of, by Sir C. Markham, 190 n.; defence of, by University of Oxford, 219.
- 'Mortrival', 301, 307.
- Mountjoy, lord, see Blount, Walter.
- Mowbray, John I, Duke of Norfolk, Earl Marshal, and previously Earl of Nottingham, takes 'Loveris', 291; his escape from drowning, 150; in Normandy, 304.
- Mowbray, John II, Duke of Norfolk, supports Richard of York in 1451, 297; on council of Henry VI, 373; his private wars with the Pastons, 202, 205; mentioned, 361, 371.
- Mowbray, John III, Duke of Norfolk, supports Edward IV, 375; K.G., 380.
- Mowbray, Thomas, Earl of Nottingham, and Earl Marshal, rises with Archbishop Scrope, 20, 277, 282, 314.
- Murrey, Charles de, captain of Dieppe, 367.
- Mutability of Worldly Changes, On the*, 242, 395-7.
- Mytteney, George, 387.
- N
- Napier, H. A., History of Ewelme, 226.
- Narbonne, Viscount of, at murder of John of Burgundy, 308; killed at Verneuil, 321.
- Nash, Thomas, on London Chronicles, 74.
- Nedeham, Richard, 364.
- Nevers, Philippe, Count of, killed at Agincourt, 317, 327.
- Nevers, Count of, killed at Verneuil, 321.
- Neville, John, son of Ralph, Earl of Westmorland, killed at Verneuil, 289.
- Neville, John, Marquis of Montagu, made Marquis, 173, 191; killed at Barnet, 374, 376.
- Neville, Ralph, first Earl of Westmorland, opposes Earl of Northumberland, 281; suppresses Scrope's rebellion, 282; fictitious speech at Leicester Parliament, attributed to, 120.
- Neville, Ralph, lord, at sieges of Rouen and Melun, 318, 319.
- Neville, Richard, Earl of Salisbury, mediates between Henry VI and Richard of York, 368, 373; appeals to Margaret of Anjou, 213; at first battle of St. Albans, 345; at Calais in 1460, 204, 245; notices of, in ballads, 245-7; letters written by, 213, 391; praised by Hardyng, 147.
- Neville, Richard, Earl of Warwick, mediates between Henry VI and Richard of York, 368, 373; at first battle of St. Albans, 345; his victory at sea in 1458, 152, 203-4; his Articles in 1459, 369; at Calais in 1460, 204; his campaign in the North, 237; intervenes in a dispute at Gloucester, 162, 356; and at Lanthony, 357; Polydore Vergil's story of his dispute with Edward IV, 191; with Clarence at Calais in 1469-70, 174, 213, 370; his agreement with Margaret of Anjou, 174; killed at Barnet, 374, 376; favourable notices in contemporary writers, 95, 147, 180; hostile notices, 172, 183; his prominence in ballads, 245-8; letters, &c., written by, 225, 226, 369, 391, 392.
- Neville, Robert, bishop of Salisbury, 346.
- Neville, Thomas, the Bastard of Fauconberg, his attack on London, 159, 175, 248, 374; his execution, 374, 375.
- Newborow, Sir William, 378.
- Newcastle-on-Tyne, 343.
- Newcastle - under - Lyne, 343.
- Nicholas V, Pope, 354.
- Nichols, J. G., edited Chronicle of the Rebellion in Lincolnshire, 173; and Grants of Edward V, 224.
- Nicolas, Sir Harris, uses the Gesta Henrici ('The Chaplain's Account') in his Battle of Agincourt, 45, 49; Chronicle of London, edited by, 73, 74, 76; its character and value, 83-5; other contents of the same volume,

- 75, 238; his Proceedings and Ordinances of the Privy Council, 211, 213, 214.
- Nogent, 319, 335.
- Norfolk, the Pastons in, 198, 199, 200, 205.
- Norfolk, Dukes of, see Howard; Mowbray.
- Norham, Master, his Chronicle, 148, 311.
- Normandy, the war in, 132, 277, 285, 288, 289, 316, 318, 331; the spoil of, 34; state of, under English, 222; Richard of York in, 144; loss of, 162, 243, 347, 361, 372; Charles the Bold in, 381; Walsingham's History of, 18.
- Northampton, Henry VI at, 373; battle of, 98, 159, 246, 248; William Herbert executed at, 356; mentioned, 343, 364, 371.
- Northern Chronicle*, A, its character and value, 35, 36; possible connexion with other Chronicles, 22, 42, 43, 44, 61; manuscripts of, 279; text of, 279-91.
- Northumberland, Henry IV in, 283; Edward IV in, 237, 369.
- Northumberland, Earls of, see Percy.
- Northwich, Cheshire, 364.
- Norwich, 162, 343.
- Norwich, bishops of, see Courtney, Richard; Lyhert, Walter.
- Nottingham, 343, 364, 393.
- Nottingham, Earl of, see Mowbray, Thomas.
- O
- Oceland, Christopher, his Anglorum Prælia, 272.
- Olandyne, story of, 54.
- Oldcastle, Sir John, lord Cobham, takes part in expedition of 1411, 315; his trial for heresy, 17; his escape from the Tower, 318, 325; his rebellion, 35, 47, 123, 284, 292, 293, 324; in hiding, 47; his later career, 17; his capture, 50, 308; his execution, 309, 318; Strecche's account, 41; hostility of Walsingham to, 17; Hoccleve's exhortation to, 231; a political poem on, 234.
- Oldhall, Sir John, a youthful adviser of Richard of York, 156, 338, 441.
- Oldhall, Mary, 338.
- Oldhall, Sir William, at Verneuil, 321; process against, reversed, 203; notice of, 338.
- Old Sarum, 343.
- Oman, Professor C. W., criticisms by, 98, 113-14, 117, 173.
- Orange, Louis de Chalons, Prince of, 319.
- Orleans, 217.
- Orleans, Charles, Duke of, his conflict with Burgundy, 22, 315; taken prisoner at Agincourt, 278, 286, 317, 327; his release, 221; his poems, 5 n.
- Ormonde, Earls of, see Butler.
- Orth, or Erth, Sir Hugh, 321.
- Oswestry, Salop, 390.
- Oteley, William, 391.
- Otterbourne, Thomas, notice of, 21; his Chronicle, 21-3; its connexion with Walsingham, 16, 21, 22, 43; manuscripts, 23; use of, by Stow, 23, 269; mentioned, 239.
- Otterburn, Battle of, ballad, 238.
- Owgan, Sir Henry, 363.
- Oxford, Earls of, see Vere.
- Oxford, the town, 276, 343, 371.
- Oxford, University of, state of learning at, 6; scholars at, 6, 21, 33, 162, 166; Walter Paston's life at, 208; teaching of Greek at, 4, 6; Oxford scholars in Italy, 6; connexion of Henry V with, 4, 184; liberality of Humphrey of Gloucester to, 4, 58, 158, 344; Duchess of Suffolk and, 5, 219; London citizens and, 6, 220; correspondence of, in Epistolæ Academicæ, 219, 220; allegation that Polydore Vergil pillaged the library, 257.
- P
- Page, John, his Siege of Rouen, its character and value, 116-18; dependence of other writers on it, 42, 118, 120, 132, 301; mentioned, 237.
- Pakington, William, author of the French Brut, 114.
- Palgrave, Sir Francis, on Hardyng's forgeries, 142.
- Palmer, Thomas (1419), letter to, 389.
- Palmer, Thomas (1450), 365.
- Par, Sir John, 385, 387.
- Paris, reconnoitred by Thomas of Clarence, 53, 334; Charles VI at, 389; surrendered to English, 278; Henry V at, 54, 336; Henry VI crowned at, 92, 320, 337, 351; mentioned, 184 n., 315, 319.
- Parker, Henry, 97.
- Parker, Matthew, archbishop of Canterbury, his edition of Walsingham, 18; his reference to Tito Livio and the Pseudo-Elmhams, 62.
- Parliaments:
1399. The Lancastrian Revolution, 20, 33, 87, 275. 1401. Taxation; prosecution for heresy, 276. 1404. Unlearned Parliament, 16, 21. 1410. Lollards' Bill, 16, 87, 88. 1411. Projected abdication, 27. 1414. Leicester, 41, 54, 120, 121, 264, 285, 293, 325. 1416. March, 48, 287. 1421. October, 294, 302. 1421. Coinage, 278; Earl Douglas at, 290. 1423-8. Financial legislation, 82, 86. 1445-6. List of constituencies represented, 158, 342, 343; dispute of the Dukes of

- Warwick and Buckingham, 353. 1447. Bury, 129, 179, 244, 344, 347, 353, 361, 397. 1450. Accusation of Suffolk, 344. 1451. Indictments, 359. 1455. Bill of Resumption, 151. 1460. York's Claim, 159. 1461. First Parliament of Edward IV, 152. 1472. The congratulation of Edward IV, 382; The Sire de Gruthus made Earl of Winchester, 388. 1474. An address to the Commons, 218.
- Parliamentary government under the Lancastrian Kings, 2; payment of members, 343.
- Paston, Agnes, 198, 199, 207.
- Paston, Clement (1390), 198.
- Paston, Clement (1460), 204.
- Paston, Edmund, 200.
- Paston, Elizabeth, 201, 206.
- Paston, John (d. 1466), his propensity for keeping letters, 197; his family, 198; his character, 199, 206; his relations with Fastolf, 199, 204; his trust as Fastolf's executor and consequent troubles, 199, 205; represents Norfolk in Parliament, ib.; his correspondents, 200, 346, 359.
- Paston, Sir John the elder (d. 1479), his Court life, 198, 205; his friendship with Anthony Woodville, 206; his character, 207.
- Paston, Sir John the younger (d. 1503), the ancestor of the later family, 198; his correspondence and character, 206; his love-making, 207.
- Paston, Margaret, her marriage, 198; her letters, 201, 202, 204, 207; her character, 206; her house-keeping, 207.
- Paston, Robert, Earl of Yarmouth, 198.
- Paston, Walter, his life at Oxford, 208.
- Paston, Sir William, founder of the family, 198; his correspondence, 199; his family life, 206, 207.
- Paston, William, son of William, his letters, 202, 204, 393 n.
- Paston, William, son of John, at Eton, 207, 208.
- Paston, William (d. 1732), second Earl of Yarmouth, his papers sold, 197.
- Paston, Letters, The*, their history, 197; Sir John Fenn's edition, ib.; Dr. Gairdner's editions, 197, 198, 200; the manuscripts, 198; their importance for the illustration of political history, 178, 199-206; their illustration of social life, 206-8; their literary quality, 3, 10; their evidence on the state of education, 194; some additional letters, 393 n.
- Patrington, Stephen, bishop of St Davids, 14.
- Patten, William, his contributions to Holinshed's Chronicles, 272 n.
- Pay, Harry, 20.
- Payne, Peter, Lollard, 222.
- Pecche, Sir William, 384.
- Pecock, Reginald, bishop of Chichester, 129, 153, 270.
- Peebles, 146.
- Peeris, William, his metrical Chronicle of the family of Percy, 252.
- Pembroke, Earls of, see Herbert; Tudor, Jasper.
- Penneux, Mounsyr de, 318.
- Penycoke, or Penycol, John, 365.
- Percy, Sir Henry (Hotspur), at Homildon Hill, 280; stories of his quarrel with Henry IV, 122, 126, 136; at Shrewsbury, 277, 281, 314, 350; his body disinterred and mutilated, 281; his daughter married to John Clifford, 282; Har-dyng in his service, 141; prophecies applied to, 236.
- Percy, Henry, first Earl of Northumberland, at Homildon Hill, 280; held in check by Earl of Westmorland, 281; arrested at Pontefract, 282; imprisoned at Baginton, 35, 282; released, ib.; takes refuge in Scotland, 283; goes to Wales, ib.; in France, 33, 283; defeated and slain at Bramham Moor, 36, 39, 277, 283, 311, 315; prophecies applied to, 236.
- Percy, Sir Henry, of Athol, surrenders Alnwick, 283.
- Percy, Henry, second Earl of Northumberland, taken to Scotland, 283; in exile there, 285; restored in blood, ib.; returns to England, 287; defeats Scots at Roxburgh, 322; captures Pierre de Brézé at Whitby, 367; killed at St. Albans, 345, 349.
- Percy, Henry, fourth Earl of Northumberland, his action in 1471, 392; with Edward IV, 375; at Court, 383; his pursuivant, 384; a collection of prophecies made for him, 236 n.
- Percy, Henry, fifth Earl of Northumberland, William Peiris writes for him, 252.
- Percy, Thomas, Earl of Worcester, the insurrection of 1403 due to his false counsel, 314; be-headed, 281, 314.
- Percy, Thomas, lord Egremont, supports Henry VI in 1452, 373; breaks out of Newgate, 107; at battle of Northampton, 246.
- Perneys, John, sheriff of London, 295.
- Peronne, 381.
- Peter of Blois, forged chronicle of, 179.
- Petrie, Henry, his transcripts, 24, 155.
- Petteworth, Richard, 389.
- Petyt, William, 279.
- Pew, Our Lady of, the King's chapel at Westminster, 372, 383.
- Philip, see Burgundy, Duke of.
- Philip, William, chamberlain of London, 103.

- Philippa, daughter of Henry IV, 315.
 Phreaz, or Free, John, studies under Guarini, 6.
 Piggot, John, his Memo-randa, 166, 169, 369-73.
 Pisa, Council of, 16.
 Pius II, Pope (Aeneas Sylvius), 5 n., 119, 213, 342.
 Plasshe, Essex, 313.
 Plomar, Bartholomew, 295.
 Plumpton, Robert, 393.
 Plumpton, Sir William (1405), implicated in Archbishop Scrope's rebellion, 130, 282, 314 n.
 Plumpton, Sir William (1460), 210.
Plumpton Correspondence, The, 210.
 Plymouth, Bekynton at, 222, 223; lord Rivers at, 372; mentioned, 343.
 Plympton, 343.
 Pole, Alice de la, Duchess of Suffolk, granddaughter of Chaucer, 5; indicted in 1450, 364; acquitted, 216; her gifts to the University library at Oxford, 5; letters from the University to, 219, 220; a letter written by, 392.
 Pole, John de la, second Duke of Suffolk, marries sister of Edward IV, 205; supports Edward IV, 375; at Court, 383.
 Pole, Michael de la, second Earl of Suffolk, dies at Harfleur, 285.
 Pole, Michael de la, third Earl of Suffolk, killed at Agincourt, 278, 286, 294, 317 n., 327.
 Pole, William de la, Earl, Marquis, and Duke of Suffolk, at sieges of Rouen and Melun, 318, 319; his mission to Tours for betrothal of Margaret of Anjou, 93; created marquis, 353; accused of corrupt promotion of bishops, 242; charges against, 166, 344, 360, 361; his arrest and imprisonment in the Tower, 344, 347; released and leaves England, 201, 344; his farewell letter to his son, 201; his murder, 296, 344, 347, 366, 371; a contemporary notice of the French marriage shows no hostility, 94; Hardyng's first version favourable to, 143, 144; the second version hostile, 147; adverse Yorkist criticism: in the Brut, 121; in the Croyland Chronicle, 179; hostility of Tudor historians: of Polydore Vergil, 255; and still more, of Hall, 265; satirical verses against, 242-4, 358, 370; notices of, in the Paston Letters, 200, 201; his poems, 5 n.; his secretary and steward, 366.
 Polford, John, 364.
 Political Poems, 233, 242-5, 358, 359, 370.
 Polydore Vergil, see Vergil.
 Pont de l'Arche, English cross the Seine at, 41, 42; captured, 319; story that Clarence was slain at, 42.
 Pontefract, death of Richard II at, 279 n.; Henry IV at, 282; Henry V at, 290.
 Pont Meulan, 82 n., 319.
 Pontoise, John of Burgundy at, 333; capture of, 17, 18, 42, 53, 319, 334.
 Poole, Dr. R. L., on Gascoigne's Theological Dictionary, 167.
 Popering, in Flanders, English envoys insulted at, 124; burnt by Humphrey of Gloucester, 125, 322, 352.
 Porke, Sir Matthew, 321.
 Porter, Sir William, 318.
 Portsmouth, Henry V embarks at, 303; Margaret of Anjou lands at, 347; mentioned, 343.
 Portugal, King of, made Knight of the Garter, 380.
 Poynings, Robert, lord, 321.
 Poynings, Robert, Cade's standard bearer, 201; cleared of treason, 203.
 Pretymen, Mr. E. G., 198.
 Prittlewell, Essex, 313.
 'Prophecies', 236, 237, 262, 358.
 Provins, 319, 332.
 Prudhow, Northumberland, 283.
 Pseudo-Elmham, The, anonymous author of Vita et Gesta Henrici Quinti; Hearn's error in attributing the work to Thomas Elmham, 56, 57; possibility that he was a foreigner, 59; a friend of John Somerset, 57; dedicates his work to Walter, Lord Hungerford, 5, 58; date at which he wrote, 57, 58; his literary style, 59, 62, 260; character of his Vita, 59-61; its relation to Tito Livio's Vita, 56, 57, 59, 61, 63, 240; its other sources, 61; possible use of Monstrelet, 60, 61; of the Brut, 61, 113, 118; possibly used by Polydore Vergil, 55, 254; quoted by Stow under the name of Roger Wall, 62, 269; use of, by Holinshed, 62, 272; manuscripts, 56, 58, 62; Hearn's edition, 62; Latin abridgement of, 63, 130, 155; English abridgement of, 64; references to Henry V's northern progress in, 36, 42, 43.
 Pynson, Richard, his edition of Fabyan's Chronicle, 103.

R

- Ramsay, Sir James, his criticism of the Letters of Margaret of Anjou, 223; on battle of Tewkesbury, 376.
 Randolph, Friar, 118, 150.
 Rastell, John, his edition of Fabyan's Chronicle, 103, 104.
 Rastell, William, his edition of the History of Richard III., 185, 187.
 Ratcliffe, Sir John, captain of Calais, 352.
 Ratclyff, Robert, porter of Calais, 384, 385.
 Reading, 343, 363.
 Rede, Richard, the Latin Brut attributed to, 311.

- Redesdale, Robin of, 172, 370.
- Redmayne, Robert, his Life of Henry V, 69, 120.
- Reigate, 276, 343.
- Repington, Philip, bishop of Lincoln, his letter to Henry VI, 34.
- Rheims, 319.
- Rhys ap Die, 26.
- Ricart, Robert, town-clerk of Bristol, his Kalendar, 111.
- Richard II, King of England, at Gloucester Abbey in 1378, 355; his deposition, 24, 34, 43, 229, 262, 275, 279, 312; his death, 20, 125, 138, 276; his reinterment, 231, 292; masses for, provided by Henry V, 120; a Yorkist view of, 248; his chaplains, 313; his queen, 27; Life of, by a Monk of Evesham, 23.
- Richard III, King of England, previously Duke of Gloucester: birth, 125; charge that he murdered Prince Edward at Tewkesbury disproved, 172, 173; present in London, 375; at the Tower at the time of Henry VI's death, 172; accused of murder of Henry VI, ib., 181, 185, 191; goes into Kent on the following day, 374, 375; at the Garter feast in 1472, 380, 381; his coronation, 179; unfair charge that he appropriated his brother's wealth, 183; his relations with Buckingham, 185, 213, 251, 393; his visit to Exeter, 273; believed to have murdered his nephews, 101, 165 n., 183, 185; rumour that he had poisoned his wife and planned to marry his niece, 101, 250; 'noise and dislauder' against, 394; alleged intention to destroy the Stanleys, 251; his courage at Bosworth, 252; commendation of, in 1471, 248, 382; a good report of him as king, 219; his popularity at York, 225; adverse Tudor criticism of, 109, 165 n., 189, 263; The History of Richard III a crushing condemnation, 190; story of his deformity, 184; described as a comely prince, 270; letters written by, 213, 393, 394; Worcester's Collections dedicated to, 164; Collyngbourne's couplet on, 249. Narratives of his reign, 100-2, 106, 109, 183-9, 191, 263, 270; letters relating to his reign, 206, 208, 209, 210, 213, 219, 224, 225, 393, 394; ballads on his downfall, 249-52.
- Richard, Earl of Cambridge, escorts Philippa of Lancaster to Denmark, 315; created Earl of Cambridge, 293; his plot against Henry V, 17, 47, 231, 288, 316, 325; Yorkist fable of his claim to the throne, 125.
- Richard, Duke of York, in France in 1430, 291; regent of Normandy, 144, 156; his small success there, 338, 339, 341; sent to Ireland, 145; his popularity in 1450, 244; Commons of Kent complain of his exile, 361; leaves Ireland, and arrests Bowlers and others, 162, 297; reaches Stony Stratford on 23rd Sept., and comes to London, 372; his Bill to Henry VI, 165, 358, 366-7, 390, 391; in Jan. 1451, at Stratford-at-Bow, ib.; in London, Dec. 1451, 297; at Dartford in Feb. 1452, 297, 298, 368, 373; at Ludlow, 368; opposition to Somerset in 1453-4, 136 n., 202; his dream in August 1454, 371; at St. Albans, 151, 345, 349; comes over from Ireland in Oct. 1460, 247; his popularity, 246; appears in Parliament, 152, 159, 273; his Claim, 165, 168; killed at Wakefield, 204; Hoccleve's ballad to, 231; Hardyng addresses his second version to, 142, 143; Polydore Vergil's censure, 255; his councillor, Davy Hall, 263; his letters and Proclamations, 213, 270.
- Richard, Duke of York, son of Edward IV, created Duke of Norfolk, 125 n.; his murder, 183, 184, 250, 252.
- Richard ap Robert, 364.
- Richemont, Arthur de, captured at Agincourt, 286, 317, 327.
- Ries ap David ap Thomas, 364.
- Riley, H. T., works edited by: Walsingham's Historia Anglicana and Ypodigma Neustriæ, 13, 18; Annales Henrici Quarti, 19; Amundesham's Annales, 150; Whethamsted's Registrum, 154; contests authorship of Historia Anglica, 13-15; his conjecture as to authorship of Annales, 19; his suggestion on the St. Albans Annals, 150; on the compilation of Whethamsted's Registrum, 153; his Memorials of London Life, 217; his translation of the Croyland Chronicle, 179 n.
- Ripon, Henry IV at, 282; Earl of Northumberland at, 283.
- Rivers, Earls, see Woodville.
- Robin Hood, 267.
- Roche Guyon, 319.
- Roches, Andrieux de (Mounsyr Roche), 318.
- Rochester, bishops of, see Alcock, John; Rotherham, Thomas; Russell, John.
- Rochester, indictments at, in 1450, 359, 364; Henry VI at, 372; Sire de Gruthus at, 385; mentioned, 343.
- Roger of St. Albans, reputed author of 'Considerans' Chronicle, 164.
- Rogers, J. T., his edition

- of Gascoigne's Theological Dictionary, 38, 167.
- Rokeby, Sir Thomas, 283.
- Rolleston, Robert, letter written by, 390.
- Rollewinck, Caspar, his Fasciculus Temporum, 119, 138.
- Rome, Adam Usk at, 33, 34; John Milverton at, 97; erroneous statement that Hardyng visited, 141; Whethamstede's visit to, 151; William Swan at, 224; Polydore Vergil alleged to have sent manuscripts to, 257; Earl of Shrewsbury returns from, 372; Antony, Earl Rivers, goes to, 393.
- Romney, 343.
- Roos, or Rose, Sir Henry, beheaded at Tewkesbury, 378.
- Roos, John, lord de, at sieges of Rouen and Melun, 318, 319; killed at Bauge, 290, 320.
- Roos, Richard, letters to, 393 n.
- Roos, Thomas I, lord de, drowned in 1430, 291.
- Roos, Thomas II, lord de, with Henry VI in Kent, 372.
- Rose of England, The*, ballad, 249-50.
- Rose of Rouen, The*, ballad, 247-8.
- Rotherham, Thomas, successively bishop of Rochester and of Lincoln, afterwards archbishop of York, 176, 379, 382.
- Rouen, siege of, by Henry V, 17, 18, 23, 42, 53, 82 n., 116-18, 124, 130, 132, 134, 318-19, 331; captains present at, 318; deaths at, 289; legend of thirty kings, 126; provisions sent to, from London, 217; rejoicing in London after fall of, 34; Dauphin's envoys at, 332; Henry V at, 216, 335, 389 n.; loss of, 243-4.
- Rous, John, his Historia Regum, 170, 184-5; other works, 185; on death of Henry VI, 181 n.; use of, by Stow, 268 n., 270.
- Rowes, Sir William, 378.
- Roxburgh, siege of, 322.
- Russell, John, Lollard, 222 n.
- Russell, John, bishop of Lincoln, an Oxford scholar, 6; letter of Richard III to, 213; on embassy at Bruges, 380.
- Rye, Sussex, 343, 389.
- Rymer, Thomas, his Fœdera: private letters in, 212; transcripts for, 213, 214; English documents in, 216 n., 217.
- S
- St. Albans Abbey, history of, 19, 150; school of history at, 12, 18-20, 25, 37, 43, 150; Humphrey of Gloucester at, 150; buried there, 347. Abbots of, see Mare, Thomas de la; Wallingford, William; Whethamstede, John.
- St. Albans, first battle of, 129, 151, 157, 167, 203, 210, 345, 349, 370; second battle of, 152, 164, 247.
- St. Albans Annals*, character and value, 150, 151; connexion with Chronicles of London, 108, 150; used by Stow, 150 n., 269.
- St. Brieuc (Briak), Brittany, Earl of Kent killed at, 22, 26, 315.
- St. Cloud, Orleanists defeated at, 315.
- St. Davids, bishops of, see Chichele, Henry; Delabere, John; Langton, John; Patrington, Stephen.
- St. Denys, 319.
- St. Germain-en-Laye, 319.
- St. James de Beuvron, 90.
- St. Michael's Mount, 172.
- St. Omer, 319.
- St. Paul's, see London.
- St. Pol, Waleran, Count of, 332.
- St. Quentin, 319.
- St. Thomas Wateryng, Surrey, 299.
- Salisbury, troubles at, in 1450, 348; City Archives, 89, 215; letters to mayor of, 390, 393; mentioned, 343.
- Salisbury, bishops of, see Ayscough, William; Beauchamp, Richard; Neville, Robert.
- Salisbury, Earls of, see Montacute, John, and Thomas; Neville, Richard.
- Salley, Henry, monk of Whalley, 279.
- Sandwich, Kent, taken by French, 218; Yorkist success at, 204; mentioned, 343, 389.
- Santiago, indulgence at, 349.
- Santre, William, Lollard, 29, 32, 276.
- Sauvage, Denis, his editions of French Chronicles used by Holinshed, 273.
- Savile, Sir Henry, his censure of Polydore Vergil, 257, 258.
- Saxonfield, site of battle of Edgcote, 356.
- Say, lords, see Fiennes.
- Scales, Robert, 5th lord, killed, 289.
- Scales, Robert, 6th lord, at siege of Melun, 319.
- Scales, Thomas, 7th lord, at Verneuil, 320; killed, 163.
- Scaleschif, 344.
- Scarborough, 343.
- Schoyer, John, Prior of Lanthony, 355-7.
- Scot, Sir John, on embassy at Bruges, 380; marshal of Calais, 384; letters from, 393.
- Scotland, invasion of, in 1400, by Henry IV, 35, 276, 280; Scots defeated at Homildon Hill, ib.; Earl of Northumberland in, 277, 283; Henry Percy in, 285; the 'Foul Raid' in 1417, 60, 63, 141, 144; Hardyng's mission to, 141-3, 146; Scots in France, 319-21, 337; Scots besiege Roxburgh, 322; Margaret of Anjou in, 119; Scots invade England in 1480, 210; Scottish war in 1482, 263.

- Scotland, Kings of, see James. Queen of, see Mary of Gueldres.
- Scrope of Masham, Henry, lord, his plot against Henry V, 17, 47, 231, 255, 288, 316, 325.
- Scrope, Richard, archbishop of York, his statement of grievances, 21, 314 n.; his insurrection, 20, 35, 144, 277, 282; his execution, 26, 38, 282; his conversation with John Malvern, 26; his miracles, 123 n., 277, 282, 314; Henry IV censured for his execution, 43; Henry IV smitten with illness through, 282, 284; the story stigmatized by Hall, 264; Maidstone's Historia, 38, 167; verses on, 229.
- Scrope of Bolton, Richard, 3rd lord, killed at Melun, 289, 319.
- Scrope of Masham, Thomas, lord, 375.
- See, Martin del, 176.
- Séze, capture of, 307.
- Seller, John, monk of Whalley, 279.
- Sellyng, William, Prior of Christ Church, Canterbury, his influence in the English Renaissance, 6; a letter by, 219; letters to, 393.
- Semer, Sir Thomas, 378.
- Sens, siege of, 212, 319, 336; Jean de Montagu, archbishop of, killed at Agincourt, 286, 317, 326.
- Serie, William, 24, 292.
- Sevenoaks, Kent, 360, 371.
- Seyer, Samuel, his Memoirs of Bristol, 111.
- Sforza, Francesco, Duke of Milan, 52.
- Shaffeld, —, servant of Humphrey of Gloucester, 364.
- Shaftesbury, Dorset, 343.
- Shakespeare, William, effect of his historical plays in forming popular opinion on fifteenth century, 11, 274; derived his material from Holinshed, 273; through Holinshed he adopted Hall's prejudices, 120, 264, 265, 274; some of his ultimate sources: Henry IV, Pt. I, 66 (Translator of Livius), 122 (Brut); Henry IV, Pt. II, 107 n., 110 (London Chronicle); Henry V, 120–21 (Act I, 1 and 2: Brut), 110 (Lollards' Bill: London Chronicle), 55. (Tito Livio: character of Henry V); Henry VI, Pt. I, 264 (Joan of Arc: Monstrelet); Henry VI, Pt. II, 265 (Suffolk and Margaret: Hall developing the Brut); 110 (Cade: London Chronicle); Richard III, 273 (Holinshed). Sharpe, Jack, 88, 150.
- Sharpe, Dr. R. R., London letters in his London and the Kingdom, and Calendars of Letter-books, 217, 218.
- Sheen, foundations of Henry V at, 47, 66, 323; John Somerset at, 57.
- Shelley, Sir John, 313.
- Shelley, John, sheriff of London, 385.
- Sheppard, Dr. J. B., his editions of Litterae Cantuarienses, and Christ Church Letters, 218, 219.
- Sherborne, troubles at, in 1450, 344–9.
- Sherborne Abbey, burnt in 1437, 347; dispute about font in, 346, 348. Abbot of, see Bradford, William.
- Sherborne Annals, 158, 344–9.
- Shillingford, John, his Letters and Papers, 211.
- Shooters Hill, 298.
- Shore, Jane, 187, 188.
- Shoreham, Sussex, 343.
- Shrewsbury, Henry Tudor at, 250; letters relating to, 390, 391; Bailiffs of, 250, 391. Battle of, 20, 25, 30, 35, 141, 160, 277, 281, 314, 350, 355; memorial verses on, 29 n., 130, 350.
- Shrewsbury, Earls of, see Talbot.
- Shyrburne, John, the Latin Brut incorrectly attributed to, 311.
- Sigismund, Emperor, his visit to England, 32, 60, 278, 287, 318, 327; his reception at Calais, 69, 327; lands at Dover, 327; story that he had first to disclaim imperial authority, 66, 160; his retinue, 54, 146, 148; his reception at London, 299, 327–28; feasts in his honour, 82; made Knight of the Garter, 287, 328; goes hunting, 300; his praise of England, ib.; his negotiations, 48, 53, 89, 132, 220, 287, 328, 329; his advice to Henry V, 328; at conference at Calais, 330; at Council of Constance, ib.; his war in Bohemia, 18.
- Sion, house of Brigittines at Isleworth, 38, 58, 323.
- Slegge, Stephen, 362.
- Smert, John, Garter King of Arms, 383, 384.
- Somerset, Earls and Dukes of, see Beaufort.
- Somerset, John, account of, 57; his friendship with the Pseudo-Elmhams, 57–9; his interest in learning, 55, 58; indicted, 365.
- Somme, river, 326.
- Somnium Vigilantis*, the earliest political pamphlet in English prose, 167, 168.
- Song of the Lady Bessy*, 250–2.
- Southampton (Hampton), Henry V at, in 1415, 47, 48, 60, 288, 316, 325; muster at, in 1417, 302, 303, 331; Earl of March's fleet at, 305; threatened by Spanish fleet, 216; letters to Mayor, 393–4; mentioned, 343, 364.
- Southern Chronicle*, A, its character, 31, 32; connexion with Continuation of the Eulogium, 29, 30, 127 n.; text, 275–88.
- Southwark, Fastolf's place in, 201; Henry VI at, 298; Cade at, 201, 372;

- St. Mary Overy, 163, 298, 315 n.
- Southwell, Thomas, 340, 341.
- Southworth, Sir John, 285.
- Speed, John, owned the manuscript of Davies's Chronicle, 129.
- Springge, Edmund, 124.
- Stacy, Loys, usher to Charles the Bold, 387.
- Stafford, 343.
- Stafford, Edmund, Earl of, killed at Shrewsbury, 281, 314, 350.
- Stafford, Edmund, bishop of Exeter, 389.
- Stafford, Henry, second Duke of Buckingham, in train of Edward IV, 375; at Court, 379, 383; dances with Elizabeth of York, 387; his negotiation with Morton, 188, 189; his rebellion, 183 n., 191, 209, 210, 393; his betrayal by Banister, 249; Richard III's opinion of, 213.
- Stafford of Grafton, Sir Humphrey, sent against Cade, 273 n.; killed at Sevenoaks, 347, 360, 366, 371.
- Stafford, Humphrey, Duke of Buckingham, previously Earl of Stafford, at siege of Melun, 319; created Duke, 353; his dispute with Duke of Warwick, ib.; holds inquisition at Rochester, 359, 364; supports Henry VI, 373; killed at Northampton, 246, 356; mentioned, 361.
- Stafford of Southwick, Humphrey, Earl of Devonshire, accused of plotting against Clarence, and beheaded, 357.
- Stafford, John, archbishop of Canterbury, previously bishop of Bath, crowns Margaret of Anjou, 353; comes to London at time of Cade's rebellion, 371; Tito Livio addresses an Encomium to, 51; letters written by, 224; mentioned, 342.
- Stafford, William, killed at Sevenoaks, 347; his courageous defence, 371.
- Stallworthe, Simon, letters written by, 208.
- Standish, Sir Hugh de, 285.
- Stanley, George, lord Strange, fear of him saves his father's life, 101; his narrow escape at Bosworth, 251.
- Stanley, John (1450), 365.
- Stanley, John (1480), 393.
- Stanley, Sir Thomas, indicted in 1450, 365.
- Stanley, Thomas, lord, afterwards Earl of Derby, suspected by Clarence in 1471, 392; supports Edward IV, 375; his narrow escape in June 1483, 101; supports Henry Tudor, 249, 251; his prominence in the Song of Lady Bessy, 250, 251.
- Stanley, Sir William, 249.
- Stanlow, —, hanged at Maidstone, 371.
- Stephen, William, 393.
- Stevenson, Joseph, his edition of Worcester's Annales, 164; his Letters and Papers Illustrative of the English Wars in France, 220, 221.
- Stewart, John, Earl of Buchan, at Bauge, 320; killed at Verneuil, 321.
- Stewart, Murdach, Duke of Albany, taken prisoner at Homildon, 280.
- Stewart, Robert, Duke of Albany, Regent of Scotland, 283, 285.
- Stewart, Walter, Earl of Athol, 323.
- Stillington, Robert, bishop of Bath, and lord Chancellor, 382-83.
- Stokes, arms of, 125 n.
- Stonor, Elizabeth, 209.
- Stonor, John, 209.
- Stonor, Thomas, 209.
- Stonor, Sir William, 208-10.
- Stonor Letters, The, 196, 208-10.
- Stony Stratford, treasonable conduct of John Harries at, 371; Richard of York at, 166, 372.
- Stourton, John, first lord, 373.
- Stourton, William, second lord, 383.
- Stow, John, antiquary, his merits as an historian, 266, 270, 271; his use of Records, 266, 267, 269; his wide familiarity with Chronicles, 267; his own works, 267-9; his importance for fifteenth-century history, 11, 253, 261, 267, 271. His sources, 269-71; his use: of Walsingham, 18, 269; of Otterbourne, 23, 269; of Elmham's Liber Metricus, 50, 269; of Tito Livio, 55, 269; of the Pseudo-Elmham, 62, 269; of the 'Translator of Livius', 64-6, 68, 123, 269; of the Chronicles of London, 71, 77, 92, 94, 110, 150*n.*, 269, 292, 295, 297; of 'Register of Mayors' cited in the Summary, 107; of The Great Chronicle (Fabian's MS.), 70, 82, 83, 100, 101, 104, 270; of the Brul, 113, 118; of Davies's Chronicle, 129, 270; of Hardyng, 148; of the St. Albans Annals, 150, 151, 269; of Whethamstede, 154; of Piggot's Memoranda, 166, 369; of Warkworth, 173, 270; of The Manner and Guiding, &c., 174; of The Arrival, 176, 270; of a Tewkesbury Chronicle, 376; of Bluemantle's Record, 379; of John Rous, 270; of the History of Richard III, 270; of Monstrelet, 68, 264, 271; of Comines, 270; of documents, 269, 270, 358, 359. Manuscripts owned or used by him, 23, 62, 77, 104, 106 n., 148, 267, 292, 297. His transcripts, 23, 64, 77, 106 n., 166, 174, 176, 267, 295, 358, 359, 369, 370, 376, 379. Calendar of fifteenth-century historical pieces in his Collections, 369, 370.

His censure of Polydore Vergil, 257 n. His use of Hall, 267, 269. His quarrel with Grafton, 148, 265. His connexion with Holinshed's Chronicles, 271-3. His description of Caxton's Chronicles, 137.

Strange, George, lord, see Stanley, George.

Strange, Richard, lord, 82.

Stratford-at-Bow, 295, 372.

Strecche, John, canon of Kenilworth, 39; his Historia Regum, 40; its contents, 40-2; its value, 42, 43; its resemblances to other works, 36, 49, 50; 'tennis-ball' story in, 41, 239; use of Page's Siege of Rouen in, 42, 118.

Sudeley, lord, see Boteler, Ralph.

Suffolk, Earls, Duchess and Dukes of, see Pole.

Surrey, Duke of, see Holland, Thomas.

Sussex, Cade's rebellion in, 347.

Sutton, John, sheriff of London in 1413, 292.

Sutton, John, sheriff of London in 1440, 366.

Sutton, John, lord Dudley, indicted in 1450, 364; arrested by Richard of York, 297; supports Edward IV, 375.

Swan, William, his letter book, 224.

Swinford, Catherine, 126.

Swords, River of, 299, 317, 326.

T

Tadcaster, Yorks., 283.

Talbot, Gilbert, lord, at siege of Rouen, 289, 318.

Talbot, John I, Earl of Shrewsbury, at siege of Melun, 319; recovers Harfleur, 339; created Earl of Shrewsbury, 341, 353; hostage with the French, 244; called 'our good dog' in ballads, 243, 244; returns from court of Rome in Dec. 1450, 372; with Henry VI in Kent, ib.; supports Henry

VI, 373; does execution on John Wilkyns, 368; killed, 349, 373; his prowess, 372; his quarrel with the Berkeleys, 366*n.*

Talbot, John, Viscount Lisle, 372, 373.

Talbot, John, second Earl of Shrewsbury, prominent Lancastrian, 245; at battle of Northampton, 246, 356.

Talbot, John, third Earl of Shrewsbury, supports Edward IV, 375; at Court, 379, 383.

Talbot, Sir Thomas, Lollard leader, 284.

Tandridge, Surrey, 365.

Tankerville, Earl of, see Grey, John.

Tanner, John, letter written by, 393.

Taunton, 343.

Tavistock, Devon, 343.

Termegan, Mounsyr, 318.

Tewkesbury, sheriff of Worcester killed at, 366; battle of, 172, 175, 248, 263, 374, 376-7, 392, 393; executions after battle, 175, 377-8; list and burial places of the killed, ib.; prisoners, 374, 378; desecration of the Abbey, 377.

Tewkesbury Chronicle, 178, 376-8.

Thatcham, Berks., 342, 343.

Thedmar, Arnold, 71.

Thien (Tyne), Bastard of, 318.

Thomas, Duke of Gloucester, 24.

Thomas, Duke of Clarence, date of birth, 50 n.; Seneschal of England, 283; created Duke, 284; at siege of Harfleur, 60; captain of Touques, 304; at siege of Caen, 17, 304; his escape at Bec Helouin, 41; at siege of Rouen, 318, 342; credited with capture of Pontoise, 42; reconnoitres Paris, 53, 334; at Troyes, 335; at siege of Melun, 319; lieutenant of Normandy, 319, 337; defeated and slain at Baugé, 130, 144, 278, 289, 320, 337; his body recovered, 295; buried at Canterbury, 295, 339, 340; Page's praise of, 117.

Thomas Jankyne ap Ries, 364.

Thompson, Sir E. M., on Walsingham, 14; on Vita Ricardi, 23; his edition of Adam Usk, 35; on the Brut, 114.

Thorpe, Sir Edmund de, 289.

Thorpe, Thomas, 365.

Thoulongeon, Antoine de (Mounsyr Antony), 318.

Three Fifteenth Century Chronicles, ed. J. Gairdner, viz. London Chronicle S, 94, 95; A Brief Latin Chronicle, 159; Ely Brief Notes, 161.

Throomorton, John, 378.

Thynne, Francis, his share in Holinshed's Chronicles, 271.

Tichfield, Hants., 353.

Tille, John, 39.

Tiptoft, John, first lord, 319.

Tiptoft, John, Earl of Worcester, on the King's Council, 373; detestation of, 172; his culture, 6.

Tonbridge, Kent, 360, 366, 372.

Totnes, Devon, 343.

Toulouse, 51.

Touques, 301, 303, 304, 318, 331.

Tours, 93.

Tower of London, prisoners committed to, 292, 295, 309, 318, 325, 340, 344, 347, 371, 372; Oldcastle escapes from, 293; John Mortimer breaks out of, 296; Suffolk in, 244, 371; cell of Henry VI in, 218; Henry VI dies in, 370, 375; chamber of Elizabeth Woodville in, 218.

Towton, battle of, 137, 204, 210, 263; ballads on, 247-8.

'Translator of Livius,' The, his date, 65, 189; character of his work, 65; preserves Earl of

- Ormonde's Reminiscences, 65-7, 126; his sources, 64, 113; references to, by other sixteenth-century historians, 64, 66, 67, 268, 271, 272; his influence on opinion, 68; supplied material for Shakespeare, 65, 67; literary interest and quality, 7, 67, 68, 69, 189, 258-60.
- Tresham, Henry, 378.
- Tresham, Sir Thomas, a devoted Lancastrian, indicted in 1450, 365; taken prisoner at Tewkesbury, 377; beheaded, 378; his clerk, ib.
- Tresham, Sir William, Yorkist, Speaker in 1450, 365 n.; killed, 372.
- Trevelyan Papers, The*, 211, 229.
- Trevilian, John, unpopular minister of Henry VI, 211, 243; indicted 364.
- Trevisa, John de, his translation of Higden's Polychronicon, 8, 136, 262; Caxton's Continuation, 113, 137, 138.
- Tripartite Convention, the, account of, in Giles's Chronicle, 26; Hall's account of, 26 n., 262; authenticity of, 27.
- Troutbeck, William, 393.
- Troyes, Henry V at, 289, 335, 336; Treaty of, 17, 53, 54, 60, 61, 82, 278, 335-6.
- Truro, Cornwall, 343.
- Tuchet, John, lord Audley, supports Edward IV, 375; at Court, 383.
- Tuddenham, Sir Thomas, 200, 201.
- Tudor interpretations of fifteenth-century history, 101, 106, 165, 177, 185, 192, 255, 264, 265.
- Tudor, Jasper, Duke of Bedford, 191.
- Turnbull, —, beheaded at Tewkesbury, 378.
- Tutbury, Staffordshire, 281.
- Twates, Thomas, bailiff of Guisnes, 384.
- Tyburn, 41, 296.
- Tyne, Bastard de, see Thien.
- Tyler, James Endell, his criticism of Giles's Chronicle, 26, 27.
- Tyler, Wat, 12.
- Tyrell, Edward, co-editor of Nicolas's Chronicle of London, 238.
- Tyrell, James, conjectured that the Pseudo-Elmhams was a foreigner, 59 n.
- U
- Umfraville, Gilbert, titular Earl of Kyme, served in French expedition of 1411, 141, 315; at Pont de l'Arche, 42; at siege of Rouen, 318; killed at Baugé, 141, 290, 320.
- Umfraville, Robert, called Robin Mendmark, at Peebles, 144, 146; served in France, 141; Hardyng in his service, ib.; Hardyng's praise of, 145.
- Urswick, Christopher, 192.
- Usk, Adam, his career, 33, 34; character and value of his Chronicle, 32, 34; editions and manuscripts, 35; records songs in honour of Edmund Mortimer, 238; his account of the Revolution of 1399, 20; mentioned, 43.
- V
- Valmont, 48.
- Vauconville, 334.
- Vaughan, Thomas, chamberlain to Edward V as Prince of Wales, 383, 385, 386.
- Vaumpage or Faumpage, John, 365.
- Vaux, Sir William, 378.
- Vendôme, Jean de, 390.
- Vendôme, Louis, Count of, 317.
- Venetian merchants in England, 235.
- Vere, John de, Earl of Oxford, at Barnet, 374; commands at Bosworth, 249, 250.
- Vere, Maud de, Countess of Oxford, her treason, 16, 29 n.
- Vere, Roger de, 320.
- Vergil, Polydore, historian, wrote at command of Henry VII, 254; his Anglica Historia: for the Lancastrian period a compilation, 254, 255; of more original authority for Edward IV, 191; valuable for Richard III, ib.; limited acquaintance with original sources for early part of fifteenth century, 254, 255, 258; for latter part collected good oral information, 192, 257, 258; his aims, 256, 257; his influence on historical method, 10, 253, 256, 258, 259, 261; hostile criticism of, 257; his errors, 191, 254; his prejudice, 191, 255: use of, by Grafton, 188, 259; by Hall, 262, 263, 205; wrote in Latin, 8, 259; early English translation, 259.
- Verneuil, captured in 1417, 307; battle of, 118, 121, 124, 131, 320, 321; Earl Douglas at, 128, 331; killed at, 289, 321.
- Vernon, Henry, letters to, 225, 392, 393.
- Vernon-sur-Seine, 319.
- Versus Rhythmi*, 229.
- Visconti, Lucia, marries Earl of Kent, 314.
- Vitelli, Cornelio, teaches Greek at Oxford, 6.
- Vring (? Wring), Sir John, 378.
- W
- Wakefield, battle of, 98, 180, 204, 263.
- Walden, Essex, 353.
- Walden, Roger, bishop of London, translated from Canterbury, 275, 312.
- Waldern, William, mayor of London, 73.
- Wales, Glendower's rebellion, 24, 26, 29 n., 34, 43, 211, 212, 276, 277, 280, 281, 313; Adam Usk in, 33, 34; Earl of Northumberland in, 283; Oldcastle in, 308; Humphrey of Gloucester's estates in, 359; Welsh at Edgcote, 356.
- Wall, Roger, archdeacon

- of Coventry, the Pseudo-Elmham's Vita erroneously attributed to, 62, 269.
- Wallingford, 343, 364.
- Wallingford, William, abbot of St. Albans, 153.
- Walsingham, Thomas, account of, 12; his Historia Anglicana, 13; Riley's opinion that Walsingham was not the author, ib.; this opinion rejected by Dr. Gairdner, 14; and seems untenable, 14, 15; historical value of Historia, 15-18; its connexion with Annales Henrici Quarti, 16, 20, 21; with Otterbourne's Chronicle, 21, 22; use of, by Capgrave, 39, 169; use of, by Stow, 269; reference to Lollards' Bill in, 88; manuscripts, 13; editions, 18. His Ypodigma Astricæ, 14, 15, 18, 19.
- Walter, a priest and Lollard, 293.
- Waltham Abbey, bell-tower struck by lightning, 352.
- Waltham Annals*, criticism of, 160, 161; extracts from early part of, 350; text of, 351-3; mentioned, 36.
- Warde, Thomas, his mission to Louis XI, 184 n.
- Ware, Robert, monk of St. Albans, 19.
- Wareham, Dorset, 343.
- Warkworth Castle, Hardyng Constable of, 141; captured by Henry IV, 283.
- Warkworth, John, account of, 172; character and value of his Chronicle, 171-3; use of, by Stow, 173, 270; edition of, 173; reference to death of Edward of Wales in, 172, 376.
- Warwick, 343.
- Warwick, Duke of, see Beauchamp, Henry. Earls of, see Beauchamp, Richard, and Thomas; Neville, Richard.
- Waurin, Jean de, his use of the Brut, 136; other English sources, ib.; his copy of The Arrival, 137, 175, 176.
- Wawe, Will, a thief, 150.
- Waynflete, William, bishop of Winchester, educated at Oxford, 6; negotiated between Henry VI and Richard of York, 368, 373; at Garter feast in 1472, 380; his relations with William Worcester, 162; a letter to, 393.
- Welles, Sir Robert, his Confession, 174.
- Welling, Kent, 298.
- Wells, 343, 392.
- Wenlock, John, lord, killed at Tewkesbury, 374, 376; taken away for burial, 376; letter from Charles the Bold to, 196.
- Were, Sir Robert, 364.
- West, Thomas, lord De la Warr, 319.
- Westminster, Henry IV dies at, 315; Lollards at, 284, 293, 324; Elmham at, 46; Council of 1417 at, 302; Benedictine Chapter at, in 1421, 18, 46; Sir John Mortimer tried at, 296; Suffolk at, in 1450, 244, 344; Edward IV at, 379; Parliaments at, 353, 382, 383; mayor of London takes his charge at, 73, 99, 100.
- Places at: Canon Row, 385; Chapel of the Pew, 272, 283; St. Stephen's, 385; Sanctuary, 182 n.; White Hall in the Palace, 379, 383, 388.
- Westminster Abbey, coronations in, 277, 279, 280, 295, 320, 353; Henry V buried in, 278, 290, 320, 337; Catherine of Valois buried in, 352; services for Richard II at, 120; Versus Rhythmicæ by a monk of, 229; version of Brut possibly compiled at, 120, 134.
- Westminster Hall, Old-castle tried in, 308.
- Westmorland, Earl of, see Neville, Ralph.
- Whalley Abbey, 35, 279.
- Wharton, Henry, his Anglia Sacra, 37 n., 38 n.; cited, 56; his description of Bekynston's Correspondence, 221.
- Whethamstede, John, abbot of St. Albans, character and contents of his Register, 151; Hallam's mistaken criticism of, 152; his attitude consistent and temperate, ib.; his probable share in the compilation, 153, 154; editions, ib.; his Latin verses, ib., 229; his bad style, 170; use of by Stow, 154; and by Holinshed, 273.
- Whibley, Mr. C., questions the ascription of the History of Richard III to More, 186; on its literary style and importance, 188, 189.
- Whitby, attempted French landing at, 367.
- Whitchurch, Salop, Hotspur buried at, 281.
- White Rose, Chronicles of the*, pieces contained in, 173, 174, 176, 178, 369, 370.
- Whittingham, Robert, 226.
- Whittingham, Sir William, 377.
- Wiche, Richard, Lollard, 338, 339.
- Wiclif, John, his exhumation, 28, 127, 275.
- Wight, Isle of, French attack on, 29 n.; mentioned, 47, 305.
- Wilkyns, John, his insurrection, 368.
- William ap John, 364.
- William ap John ap David, 363.
- William ap Thomas, 364.
- Williams, Benjamin, his edition of the Gesta Henrici, 45, 49; his conjecture that Jean Bordin was the author, 45; on the Latin abridgement of the Pseudo-Elmham, 63; list of captains given by, 215.
- Willoughby, Robert, lord, at sieges of Rouen and Melun, 318, 319; at Verneuill, 320.
- Wilton, 343.
- Wiltshire, troubles of 1450 in, 346, 347.

- Wiltshire, Earls of, see Butler.
- Winchelsea, 343, 381.
- Winchester, 314, 343, 364.
- Winchester, bishops of, see Beaufort, Henry; Foxe, Richard; Waynflete, William.
- Winchester, Earl of, see Gruthus, Louis de.
- Windsor, Henry IV at, 276, 312; Sigismund at, 287; Henry VI at, 368; Henry VI buried at, 165, 181; Edward IV holds Garter feast at, 380; Sire de Gruthus entertained at, 385-8.
- Wodehouse, John, 366.
- Wodeward, William, 348 n.
- Wogan, Henry, 364.
- Wogan, Jankyn Loyde, 363.
- Wogan, John, 363.
- Wogan, William (two persons), 363, 364.
- Wokehole, Somerset, 390.
- Wolfe, Reyne, 268, 271.
- Wolsey, Thomas, Cardinal, ordered Fabyan's Chronicle to be burnt, 88, 177.
- Woodcock, William, see Erdebury, Prior of.
- Woodville, Antony, 2nd Earl Rivers, at Calais in 1459, 204; his tournament with the Bastard of Burgundy, 179; supposed concern in murder of Henry VI, 181; defeats Bastard of Fauconberg, 248, 375; commended in Parliament, 382; at Court, 387; visits Italy, 393; his death, 184; his friendship with Sir John Paston, 205, 206; his learning, 6; ballad by, 184; letters by, 226.
- Woodville, Richard, 1st Earl Rivers, indicted in 1450, 365; his projected expedition to Guienne, 372; at Calais in 1459, 204; beheaded, 357.
- Worcester, 343, 392.
- Worcester, bishops of, see Clifford, Richard; Courtney, Edmund.
- Worcester, Earls of, see Beauchamp, Richard; Percy, Thomas; Tiptoft, John.
- Worcester, or Botoner, William, account of, 162, 163; his Annales, 163, 164; his use of London Chronicles, 79, 91, 107, 108, 163; his Collections, 69, 164, 221; in service of Fastolf, 162, 200; his letters, 202-4; his Itinerarium, 162.
- Worcestershire, troubles of 1450 in, 366.
- Worthington, Gilbert, 296.
- Wotton, Wilts., 343.
- Wotton-under-Edge, 366.
- Wotton, Nicholas, mayor of London, 294.
- Wrattlesley, Henry, 378.
- Wright, Thomas, his Political Poems and Songs, pieces contained in, 50, 229, 234-6, 242-8, 358.
- Wriothesley, Charles, his Chronicle, 72.
- Wroghton, Master, 378.
- Wycombe, Bucks., 343.
- Wylde, Thomas, 364.
- Wylie, Dr. J. H., on the Tripartite Convention, 27; on 'Bullfield', 36; on the Italian translation of Tito Livio's Vita, 52.
- Wymondham Priory, 13, 14.
- Wyntyrshylle, William, monk of St. Albans, his connexion with the Annales Henrici Quarti, 19, 20.
- Wyrrot, Thomas, 363.
- Y
Yale, Denbigh, 281.
- Yardley, 372.
- Yarmouth, 343.
- Yarmouth, Earls of, see Paston, Robert and William.
- Yong, Sir John, merchant of London, sent on embassy to Bruges, 380.
- Yonge, James, his translation of the Secreta Secretorum, 5.
- York, Hotspur's head set up at, 281; Scrope beheaded at, 282, 314; the citizens seek pardon from Henry IV, 35, 282; bodies of Northumberland and Bardolf brought to, 283, 315; reception of Henry V at, 290; John Harries, a shipman of, 371; Edward IV at, 173; popularity of Richard III at, 225; municipal records of, ib.; mentioned, 343.
- York, archbishops of, see Kemp, John; Scrope, Richard; Wolsey, Thomas.
- York, Duchess of, see Cicely. Dukes of, see Edmund; Edward; Richard.
- York, Province of, 362.
- Yorkist opinion, expression of, in contemporary narratives, 121, 122, 129, 147, 153, 156, 166, 177, 185, 246, 248, 265.
- Yorkist Notes*, 178, 374, 375.
- Yorkist Partisan, Collections of a*: its contents, 358-60; Documents and Notes, 165, 360-8; Political Poems, 242-4, 358; 'Prophecies', 236-7, 358.
- Yorkshire, Henry V's progress in, 36, 42, 61, 290.
- Young, see also Yong.
- Young, Patrick, 49.

